INTRODUCTION

The Women in Development (WID) Unit and the Caribbean Documentation Centre (CDC), both units of the United Nations Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean (UNECLAC) Subregional Headquarters for the Caribbean, have prepared a second edition of the Bibliography of the WID holdings at the CDC. The first edition was prepared in 1990 and included approximately 900 references which had been acquired during the previous five years of the WID programme.

The document was widely circulated to relevant government ministries, non-governmental organizations, subregional, regional and international organizations as well as major libraries and other WID related centres. The feedback from users suggests that the publication has been well received and has contributed to the work of those in WID and in the social sector in general. It has proven to be beneficial as a major source of information for research, policy makers, for those in the field of information and, generally, for all institutions and individuals working towards the advancement of women.

That feedback and the subsequent growth of the WID holdings during the past four years have warranted the publication of this second edition which is a compilation of records for the period 1989-1992. Included in this edition are studies prepared by ECLAC on inter-island traders in the Caribbean subregion. Those studies, prepared in 1990, analyze the situation of hucksters in Dominica; agricultural traders of Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Grenada, Dominica and St. Lucia; suitcase traders who utilize the free zone in Curacao and the general participation of women in inter-island trade and export processing zones.

The present edition is the result of meticulous work performed by Ms. Patricia Raymond, a consultant to ECLAC/CDCC, who had the overall responsibility for all aspects of this publication. The ECLAC/CDCC Secretariat gratefully acknowledges her contribution and that of those staff members whose expertise was indispensable in the development and expansion of the WID database and the formulation of the print format.

The rationale for the publication remains, primarily, the satisfaction of frequent and increased demands for information on the situation of women. It also remains supportive of previously stated objectives:

- (a) To facilitate project preparations and implementation by governmental and non-governmental organizations served by the programme;
- (b) To improve the quality and raise the standards of research in the subregion; and
- (c) To contribute to the establishment of a database on women in the subregion.

The format of the bibliography has been changed to correspond to that of the Caribbean Information System for Economic and Social Planning (CARISPLAN). The main subject headings are included at the top of each page of the main entries to facilitate easier access.

Scope

The bibliography lists 367 references published during 1989 to 1992 on Women in Development from the collections of libraries in CARISPLAN, a regional network for which the CDC serves as a co-ordinating centre.

Included are articles from serial publications, monographs and less widely distributed documents such as technical reports and conference papers.

Arrangement

The bibliography is divided into two sections: the main entries and the indexes - author, subject, conference and geographic.

Main Entries

This update maintains the 15 broad subject categories of the 1990 bibliography. Numbered consecutively, the entries are arranged alphabetically by title within each category.

A general category covers those documents which encompass more than two categories or which fall outside the assigned subject groups. The 15 categories are: Research and Methodology; Development Planning; Economic and Social development; Labour/Employment; Agriculture and Rural development; Education and Training; Family/Family Planning - includes fertility and female sexuality; Health and Nutrition; Violence against women; Politics - includes feminism; Law/Legislation; Culture - includes mass media, communication, literature, religion, and theatre; History; Women's organizations - includes governmental and non-governmental organizations; and Bibliographies which includes documentation and information.

Indexes

The indexes offer alternative approaches to finding the material listed in the bibliography:

(a) The subject index provides for alphabetical arrangement by descriptor or subject heading. It includes the entry number, year of publication in parentheses and other countries dealt with in the publication.

(b) The geographic index collocates items relating to a particular country or region.

(c) The author index is arranged in alphabetical order by author, either person, institution or organization, followed by the title of the document in alphabetical order. It also includes the entry number and the year of publication in parentheses.

(d) The conference index indicates the name, date and place of conferences, meetings, seminars, workshops etc., for which papers included in the bibliography were prepared.

Availability

This Update was prepared using MINISIS and Mini-Micro CDS/ISIS software at the CDC.

The database which now contains 2000 records on "women" is available upon request on diskette to those agencies which wish to maintain an on-line copy on their microcomputers. The software programme required is the Mini-Micro CDS/ISIS package developed by Unesco and available free of cost. The bibliography and the diskette are available free of cost through the WID Unit or the CDC, at UNECLAC, P.O.Box 1113, Port of Spain, Trinidad and Tobago.

* Discusses three changes which have taken place in the discourse and practice of women and development issues over the last decade, and which have had significant influence in programmes and approaches to the issue: (1) the questioning of the whole concept of integrating women in development; (2) the increasing feminist perspective of many of the leadership of the Caribbean women's movement; (3) the substitution of the concept and category of "gender" for that of "women".

* Identifies issues worthy of research: the question of macro economic policies and their consequences on gender issues, cultural behaviour, historical research, women's perception of their skills, women and credit, women and trade, women in grassroots organizations, women in professional organizations, women and land issues and the impact of agency involvement. States that most of the research efforts must be interdisciplinary and notes that gender issues are not in isolation of issues of class, race, ethnicity, neo-colonialism and western imperialism. Additional issues suggested are gender analysis into structural inequalities which exist at the post-harvest workplace and the need to understand and investigate women strategies in coping with agricultural development.

* Outlines the methodology of a research project aimed at understanding the relationship between work and fertility, production and reproduction in Caribbean women everyday lives; how women in Guadeloupe, Haiti and Trinidad combine productive and reproductive activities, paying special attention to economic survival strategies and men - women relationship. Uses qualitative data collected in Trinidad through the life histories of 29 adults (14 Indian and 15 African). Considers the association of women with tradition and women as agents of social change. Recommends more qualitative research approaches in prospective and development studies.

paradigm. Study explores the significance of the new technologies introduced into the productive and reproductive life of women. It raises certain questions and provides an outline of some methodological research guidelines suggested by the problems as they have been defined. States that the studies would fill a significant gap in research on the subject and could provide a basis for the formulation of policies aimed at re-evaluating the role of women in society on the one hand; and increasing social equity on the other.

 * Based on material prepared for a project undertaken by Policy Alternatives for Caribbean and Central America (PACCA), on alternative visions of development in the Caribbean. Discusses a set of principles which should guide the character of the changes required - principles of self-determination, participation, self-reliance, regionalism, equity and sustainability, which should be translated into a set of policies at the international, regional and national levels. Discusses the implications at the national level, and the need for programmes of nonformal and popular education to assist women, and men, at the community level, to build the confidence and consciousness which will increase their access to services and resources. States that the feminist movement has a special contribution to make to the promotion and achievement of the goals of an alternative development model for the Caribbean.

 * Describes the development of gender planning, which, in identifying that women and men play different roles in third world society and therefore often have different needs, provides both the conceptual framework and the methodological tools for incorporating gender into planning. Briefly mentions the background to such an approach before describing the underlying conceptual rationale of gender planning which relates to the identification of women's triple role and the distinction between practical and strategic gender needs. Illustrates the capacity of different planning interventions to meet gender needs with examples for such sectors as employment, housing and basic services. Provides a critique of a number of different policy approaches to women in development from a gender planning perspective.

information and in highlighting some practical concerns regarding WID action - gender; statistical categories; women's activities; system of indicate that women in development is a complex and relevant theme for a development programme, and its constituent activities at all levels.

Ambitious socio-economic research projects not expected to precede each development project, however, a re-thinking of activities from the

* Despite the advantages and contributions of the informal sector to the national economy it is seldom included in national and international macro-level statistics. Opportunities for investment and working capital are generally denied to small entrepreneurs, and until recently they have also been ignored by the international agencies. Women in Development (WID) grants loans to clients who meet the International Development Bank criteria of a poor person. The loan money and the monies it produces moves through the economy producing extraordinary multiplier effects, and lack the factor distortions now associated with export-oriented production. WID is staffed in the main by West Indians and serves West Indians with job placement, apprenticeship opportunities and loans and is attuned to the local context in which it operates. Regular training is held and the staff actively participates in all phases of the decision-making process. Its work has been cited and funded by a variety of local and international organizations. It has also undertaken a number of research projects, best known of which is a "Study of Low Income Women in Barbados". WID's focus is in the outreach effort to its clients, especially to participants in its loan programme. It has a 90 per cent repayment rate. It is not a social welfare programme but one that allows poor people to take an economic initiative through access to assistance, credit and services, thus contributing to the creation of the necessary conditions for social change.

* Examines women's access to Jamaica's National Housing Trust(NHT), created to finance housing for those most in need. Identifies two gender biases (a) The stronger gender bias is created by economic obstacles, cultural prejudices and institutional rules that prevent many women especially poorer ones, from becoming eligible for housing loans. Despite women's greater housing need (women head over 40 percent of Jamaican households). NHT allocates most of its loans to men. (b)Among eligible loan recipients, who are primarily more secure formal sector employees, women have a higher probability of obtaining a loan. Additionally, while most of NHT's loans go to state employees, men in both the public and private sectors capture a disproportionate share of NHT's loans.

* Argues that working class women, as a consequence both of their class and their gender, have borne a disproportionately large share of the impact of the structural adjustment policies adopted by Caribbean governments. That the failure to factor gender roles into the analysis of Caribbean economies has meant that the implications of these are overlooked in the process of policy making and planning. Uses as a case study, Jamaica's experience of twenty-five years of development practices and policies:- concentration on export-oriented production, cuts in social services, devaluation and removal of food subsidies. Argues that by failing to give special consideration to their impact on women, the measures and policies adopted by governments to deal with the economic crisis will only serve to exacerbate the situation and to further limit, undermine and jeopardize women's ability to contribute to the solutions to the problems- solutions identified by governments as well as the survival mechanisms developed by women at individual, household, and community levels. Asserts that an alternative approach which directs resources toward poor women, can help achieve the kind of social transformation which promotes a model of development which is self-reliant, sustainable, holistic and participatory.

* One of the most far reaching social changes in Latin America and the Caribbean region in the last 30 years has been the ever increasing presence of women in public life, particularly in education and the work force. Working women in the world today total 815 million. In the decade 1975-1985, 15 million women were incorporated annually into the labour market. The female work force in Latin America tripled between 1950 and 1980, increasing from 10 to 32 million. Reviews the impact of major changes in the situation of women in the region over the last decades both in the public and private domains. Major changes in women's issues stem from demographic aspects - advances in birth control methods, supported at times by demographic policies; the movement of women into the work place; expansion of education which gave a greater equality of opportunities to women. Legislation now being reviewed in many Latin American and Caribbean countries, have a positive shift in the direction of equality of rights, responsibility and opportunities for women. The international community has also been promoting full participation of women in all spheres of social life. Participation by women in social movements seem to indicate a broader cultural transformation tied to new forms of political activity; the family structure has also undergone changes due, partially to the factors explained and to the breakdown in some marriages. All these changes effect groups of women in different ways, however, while major changes are taking place in urban sectors, the status of rural women remain relatively unfavourable.

* Macro-economic analysis and policies have a built-in conceptual bias against women, by excluding explicit consideration of women's unpaid labour. When such policies are formulated to re-allocate resources, the lack of explicit consideration of the process of reproduction and maintenance of human resources, tells against women. The impact of structural adjustment policies on women can be inferred from non-gender-specific data derived from studies of the impact of adjustment on "vulnerable groups". Priority should be given to monitoring the impact of adjustment on women in low-income households, women employed in the public sector and women farmers. Women's Bureaux and Women in Development professionals can participate effectively in the dialogue about modifying the adjustment process, by placing emphasis on women as producers of goods and services and as reproducers and maintainers of human resources.

States that although the study is comprehensive and well researched, the analysis bears no real departure from the traditional conservative economic policies which proved to be hopelessly inadequate in the last two decades - the conventional numbers versus people approach. Refers to the absence of any attempt at gender analysis or even the slightest focus on women as a glaring drawback. Examines the need for more innovative proposals.

* Contends that structural adjustment policies jeopardise women by reducing their access to jobs, limiting their access to services which assist them in the performance of their roles in production and social reproduction, and increasing the demands on their time. The data for Jamaica clearly indicate the relationship between structural adjustment measures and social deterioration. Women cope in several ways: by drawing on kinship and friendship networks, earning income from activities in the regional sector, changing consumption patterns or by migration. The formulation and pursuit of alternative approaches to development, based on a feminist analysis, is advocated.

* Examines the impact of the recession and structural adjustment programmes on poor urban women. The premise of the study is that women play a pivotal role within families in meeting survival needs, both through their own productive efforts in the home and labour force, and in the adjustments which they make in the supply of domestic labour in order to achieve the same, or lower levels of welfare during period of economic contraction. Looks first at the socio-cultural factors which shape Jamaican women's productive and reproductive roles, and provides background information on the situation of women in the labour market. The second section describes the elements of the structural adjustment programme and examines available data on the social impact of the crisis and adjustment policies with special reference to the experience of poor urban women.

* Focuses on development alternatives in the Caribbean, and US policies to get the region out of the debt crisis. Presents the relationship between the US and the Caribbean and the socio-economic background of the region with its consumer-oriented economy and its class, race and gender hierarchies. Discusses the development of the economic crisis: the colonial legacy, the 1950s recession, the fiscal and debt crisis, sectoral changes, the role of the International Monetary Fund and the deepening structural adjustment policies adopted. Comments on the impact of the crisis, and through presentation of case studies demonstrates survival methods. Looks at the cost of living, reductions in public expenditure and international migration. Analyses the politics of structural adjustment, its basis, the cleavages in the traditional institutions of political power, the awakening of the grassroots and the empowerment of women. Analyses US-Caribbean relations from the period of expansion through World War II to the 1960s, the structure of U.S. hegemony, alternate development strategies of the 1990s and the challenge to US hegemony. Comments on the strategies of CBI and contends that the US economic involvement in the Caribbean has done little to solve the problems of the region. Presents the region's development strategies based on the principles of self-determination, participation, self-reliance, regionalism, equity and sustainability. Concludes by discussing alternative long term and short term U.S. policies towards the Caribbean including change in US unilateral debt policies, and in trade and migration policies which would help the region to embark on a new growth path.

* Whilst there has been much work concerned with the informal sector which has served to highlight the importance of casual labour, a substantial proportion of this has approached the subject on a purely descriptive level and has failed to provide a detailed explanation of the operation of the sector. Following a brief introduction stressing the importance of the informal sector in the current Caribbean context, the results of a content analysis of scholarly Caribbean journals and bibliographic works are presented which substantiate this argument. In conclusion, suggestions for the rectification of this major omission in future research are made. These stress the salience of issues relating to topics such as urban-interaction, gender, race and social status

* Provides a background to the problem and traces population movements in Latin America and the Caribbean. It is assumed that at least 75 percent of the refugees and displaced persons are women and children. While a significant proportion are middle and upper class, the majority are generally low-income. Discusses the main activities undertaken by UNHCR and the basic objectives of the Concerted Plan of Action. Identifies the main problems of refugee and displaced women as protection (sexual and physical abuse and sexual discrimination); access to food, water, health services, education, employment and participation in decisions, cultural and dependency problems magnified by life in the camps. Concludes that there seems to be a consensus that political and technical measures must give preferential attention to the situation of women, they should be given a priority role in defining the plans and programmes intended for migrants generally, and a specific policy framework on women's needs should be prepared. One of the objectives of the study is to promote its incorporation into the general studies done at ECLAC on the status of women. In addition, to make the issue one of the concerns that will serve development in Latin America and the Caribbean and help integrate the women of the region as active agents in that development.

Surveys the Caribbean region where women form more than half the population; also looks at education, employment and heads of household. Examines the role of women and cites report by Commonwealth Secretariat which lists four roles of women: mother, home manager, producer and community organiser. Contends that Caribbean economies should focus on how, with their known constraints, they can organise themselves to enable women to perform socially defined roles. Discusses recent trends in women's activities as well as current approaches to planning and Caribbean policy making for women. Comments on the inadequacies and problems inherent in designing policies for women in the Caribbean. Attributes any improvement in the quality of the lives of Caribbean women not to government programmes but to the creativity, ingenuity and tenacity of the women themselves. Discusses the constraints placed on women and their response. Discusses the response of Caribbean governments to the social dislocation. * Provides an overview of the situation of women in the English-speaking Caribbean. Analyses structural adjustment policies; the concentration on export-oriented production; cut-backs in social services, the removal of food subsidies and devaluation and their social, economic and political consequences. Analyses the gender implications of these policies and concludes that women certainly need to be consulted when their interest, even in those practical non-controversial areas are threatened. A gender analysis of the impact of structural adjustment policies on women, would help in understanding the limitations of policies which focus exclusively on meeting practical gender needs, and which avoid dealing with women's strategic interests. This analysis should also help to provide a clearer understanding of the link between social, cultural, political and even economic consequences of narrowly defined economic policies.

* Attempts to review the more recent past to assess the present economic status of women and children at a time when there continues to be fiscal distress. Analysis shows that advances were made in education at all levels with women entering areas in which they were traditionally absent. The most dramatic changes were in tertiary education and training even though in areas like Engineering, the process is still to be effected. States that while there are no formal barriers to the entry of women, the secondary school system might be a predisposing factor steering girls away from such areas. The infrastructure for social welfare support was improved but only marginally so and not in keeping with the needs of the present. Recommends areas and issues for urgent attention - institutional strengthening of the Ministry responsible for social welfare; compilation of data on mortality, programmes for leading causes of death; efforts to be made to postpone age of first union to an older age; research- eg into the contributing factors of death, factors leading to cancer of the uterine cervix and of the breast; studies on the nutritional status of the under two year olds; handicapped children and child abuse.

* In Caribbean countries, women's economic participation rates appear favourable compared to most developing countries, but are less than half that of men; unemployment rates, twice as high as men's are rising. Conventional indicators, unlike women, do not define and measure women's work as the totality of the activities they undertake to maintain their households. Consequently, they reflect neither the impact of factors influencing women's involvement in income earning, nor the need for direct and indirect support to increase their options. The present economic crisis has highlighted this need as women have intensified their struggle to find adequate livelihoods to support themselves and their children. Donors could be more effective if they moved to an income-earning policy approach, acting as advocates to influence discussions at the international level, and as facilitators of collaborative ventures at regional and national levels. * Provides a background to the survey conducted during the months of March and May 1989 on the inter-island traders and identifies the factors which have facilitated the entry of women into this trade. Presents the findings on the Hucksters, their activity cycle, the Hucksters' Association, the problems encountered and recommendations proposed by them. Summarises the findings and concludes that the Hucksters constitute a dynamic sector of entrepreneurs in the informal sector of the region's economies, where they play an important role by responding to the need for food and other consumer goods that are not available in sufficient quantities through formal sector import/export channels. In spite of their contribution to economic development, government programmes and policies continue to focus on promoting exports in the formal sector. Recommends the setting up of a pilot project, which in the long term would increase the control the traders have on their business, and elevate their economic and social position. Also recommends improvements in the collection of data on the traders and their trade.

* Tests the validity of the argument, in the case of Jamaica, that domestic service rose and fell along with the growth and maturing of industrial society. With comparative reference to the experience of Britain and the United States, argues that the pattern of growth and decline in private domestic service over the past two hundred years was common to the three countries, but with differences in chronology that are not easily explained by variations in the rate of industrialization. Discusses changes in the social status of domestic workers which have been crucial in determining the levels of employment in this sector. Concludes that it is not surprising that in spite of the universal claims made for the model, it fits Jamaica poorly, what is less expected is the failure of urbanization to account for the Jamaican pattern and the uncertain role of unemployment levels.

* Presents and analyses data from a survey undertaken in mid 1989 in several Caribbean countries, together with data from a report on industrial free zones and female labour with special reference to the Dominican Republic. Reviews the early industrialization experience, and presents the survey findings on national policy on EPZ's and the legislative framework within which they operate. Identifies the incentives and benefits, and provides a general overview of companies engaged in export processing activities with special reference to recruitment policies and social characteristics of female employees. Research findings suggest that advantages and disadvantages would need to be carefully weighed on a country to country basis. Over 100,000 jobs (16,000 in the countries surveyed and 90,000 in the Dominican Republic) have been generated in a relatively short time. Puts forward arguments for and against EPZ's, and concludes that they have proven themselves as catalyst in the creation of jobs especially for women, and are therefore one approach to solving endemic problems of unemployment in the Caribbean. As constituted they will however, never offer higher standards of living to the people of the region. Provides suggestions which would improve the standard of living and greater local involvement.

* Presents research findings from two of ECLAC's projects - "Women in development and trade in the Caribbean" and "The Establishment of a database on women's participation in social and economic change". Inter-island trade is characterized by two kinds of trade - trade in agricultural produce and trade in manufactured goods - the suitcase trade. There are 1500-2000 traders in agricultural commodities and a suspected larger number in non-agricultural produce. Provides findings on age distribution, movement of traders, mode of transport, activity cycle and patterns in trade. Identifies the major problems encountered by traders and concludes that the traders are marginalizing and less able than before to adjust and adapt successfully to the hostile trading environment - the women in particular face constraints in penetrating new markets. Without incentives and government support to upgrade the trading sector, the trade will not survive.

* Addresses the expansion of off-shore information processing industries, and the implications of this new high-tech sector for new strategies of economic development in Barbados, and within the lives of the young women who are incorporated into them in increasing numbers. The scope of the discussion is general, and poses largely an introduction to the research in progress. Based on interviews with development officers and managers/owners of eight of the eleven companies currently operating in Barbados as well as ongoing participant-observation within the two largest companies and, in-depth interviews with approximately forty of their employees (ranging from management and supervisory staff through various divisions of rank and file workers). * Presents the preliminary results of a research project which explores the relations between women of the middle class, and those in domestic service in terms of women's struggle for greater social, and particularly, gender equality. Examines the concept of the double day and its value as an analytical tool. Presents two hypotheses linked to migration history and working situation of women before their incorporation into urban domestic service. The general hypothesis proposes that the rural household structure allows women to emigrate more easily than men; the second proposes that the pauperization of the peasant population affects women first - they are expelled to the city to work in domestic service. Concludes that the preliminary results on the relation between the feminist movement and domestic service cannot be a recommendation to strive for the elimination of domestic service altogether, and that it is incumbent upon the feminist movement to challenge the socioeconomic and cultural conditions that maintain this particular form of servitude.

These include immigration and customs documentation. Based on this data and interviews conducted with inter-island traders, the study provides an overview of the inter-island trade in agricultural products and in non-agricultural products, the so-called 'suitcase trade'. For the former, information is presented on trading patterns, the hucksters of Dominica, types of goods and quantities traded and the activity cycle of the traders. These women travel mainly to the Dominican Republic, Panama, Curacao and Miami in search of merchandise to resell in Haitian towns. * Based on research in progress on West Indian (English-speaking Afro-Caribbean) women in New York currently or previously employed as private child-care and domestic workers. Discusses migration and domestic work and relates the experiences to an abbreviated history of domestic work in the United States. Focuses on aspects of the asymmetrical relations of domestic work that West Indian women experience in New York. Concludes that the experiences of these West Indian domestic and child care workers are both profoundly structural and historically specific. The current conditions of underdevelopment in the Caribbean create the need for women to migrate in pursuit of opportunity - educational and occupational - in order to support themselves and their families. Both the workers and the tasks are held in low esteem. Their sex, colour and position as migrants further influence attitudes and behaviour shown toward them. For them, respect is the central issue. Their strength, determination and networks of support, empower them to cope, resist and move toward their goals.

* Women make up the majority of local government employees in Great Britain but are not, however, evenly represented throughout the employment structure. Rather, women are overwhelmingly concentrated in low paid, low status and often part-time jobs, and are under-represented as decision makers, either as managers or elected council members. The situation of black and ethnic minority women is one of even greater marginalization. From 1982-7 over 200 local authorities adopted equal opportunity (EO) policies, both for employment practice and service delivery, the aims of which included redressing this inequitable situation for women. The achievements of these EO policies have proved to be very limited. Most have been introduced with few resources and little managerial or political support and without mechanisms for implementation or management accountability. EO reforms have been contained within the existing relationships and structures of local authorities when by definition, successful EO policies will upset the status quo. Nevertheless important lessons have been learned from this first pioneering phase of EO policy development. [Journal abstract]

* The International wages for Housework Campaign was founded in 1972. Its basic agenda is to have people and governments recognize the economic value of housework and to count it into the Gross National Product. In the United States women in the home produce 25-40 percent of the GNP and in the third world countries women's production of wealth would be an even higher proportion of the GNP. In Africa women's unwaged work produces an estimated 80 percent of the food on which the continent survives. The progression of women as they moved from unwaged work into the world of waged work and the progression of the debates that permeate the society on the recognition of housework is discussed.

* Presents the key findings of a survey on inter island agricultural traders and identifies the hardships of huckstering. Suggests that the situation can be improved through direct support to women traders with respect to training, credit, mobilization and organizational development; policy intervention; and data information and communication. Concludes that the economic role of the huckster trade will become more important, with initiatives already in the making within the OECS to diversify agricultural export trade. Collaborative efforts among concerned organizations - government and NGOs- are essential to alleviate the burden faced by the traders, but any intervention made must preserve the independence of the traders.

* Based primarily on a sample survey. Discusses the traders within the wider social and economic context of the national and regional economies in which they operate, and the female traders in the context of recent patterns of female employment in the Caribbean, in order to explain how and why their numbers have been growing rapidly over the past 15 years. Assesses the impact of this trade in the home country of the traders, and examines recent economic trends and changes in female labour-force participation in Jamaica, Dominican Republic and Haiti. Presents the findings of the social and economic survey - the socio-economic characteristics of the inter-island traders, their trading practices and problems. Data disaggregated by sex, so that similarities and differences between female and male traders could be ascertained and specific issues concerning women highlighted. Recommendations for improvements in the home country, the Curacao free zone, airlines and Curacao airport are provided. The general objectives of the survey and the research methodology are presented as an appendix.

* According to census records in Latin American societies, the greater part of the adult male population appears as working population while the majority of women appears as non-working population, i.e., they are registered as homemakers. In exploring the reason for this, it was discovered that the definition of the term "working population" used in censuses and surveys posed a number of difficulties for the proper measurement of female work. However, despite the limitations and defects in population censuses, they are the only statistical instrument available for measuring the main trends in the economic participation of the population overtime. Through an analysis of these census figures, attempts are made to outline the work undertaken by Latin American women in the labour markets and in the domestic area. The economic crisis within Latin America countries and its repercussions on women's work and on family life and the home are also discussed. Trends in women's participation in the labour market between 1960 and 1980/1985 have the following characteristics: female workers by age increased in the period 1960-1985 in all groups between 15 and 64; there was greater participation by young age groups (20-24 and 25-29) in all countries with advanced modernization such as Argentina, Uruguay, Chile and Costa Rica. In countries such as Paraguay and Guatemala, the participation structure by age is the same as prevailed in 1960. A study by the International Labour Organisation in 1984, shows that time dedicated to housework was often equal to or greater than that dedicated to paid work in the market, so that a high proportion of housewives were "overemployed". From 1980 onward, Latin America experienced a drastic decline in economic growth and this was reflected in the labour market and the home. Conclusions drawn from the statistical and qualitative data provided show that the repercussions of the crisis had different effects on workers of both sexes. The situation of inequality has been heightened by the crisis, to the point where average female income in some cases is half of the average male income.

* Garment and textile production has historically been a significant area of women's work in Trinidad and Tobago. This paper traces the changing forms of women's participation in this industry within the context of overall developments in the economy. Women's work has ranged from self-employment, the 'putting out' system to industrial wage-labour, although one form was never exclusive. Urban employment has been important for women since the 19th century and labour organisation and struggle an important mechanism for challenging the poor working conditions characteristic of this industry. Reviews the impact industrialisation has had on wage labour markets, and examines women's participation in the labour market in terms of unskilled occupations traditionally reserved for them, both low-income and middle strata occupations. In analysing various schools of thoughts vis-a-vis labour market theories, an assessment is made of training and educational opportunities, remuneration, sex segregation, and labour mobility or flexibility occasioned by the educational status achieved by women in the region.

* Observes that the thrust of feminist scholarship has been to place the household in a new position in economic analysis, as the focal point for understanding the labour process, the linkages between production and reproduction, and the consideration and integration of class, ethnic, kin and gender relationships. Discusses the integration of women into the economic system in the Caribbean by examining the informal or underground economy. Suggests that the character of income generation in this sector is such as to establish dynamic linkages to the formal (capitalist) sector, and the mode of insertion of the Caribbean in the international capitalist system results in an endemic labour surplus that exaggerates the importance on the informal sector during the periods of crisis. It is this which pushes women into increased informal activities such as street-vending and petty commodity production. At the same time, the reproduction of the labour force continues to depend on the exploitation of women's and children's unpaid work within the household. Suggests that Caribbean feminist research could benefit from infusing the wealth of empirical analysis with theoretical perspectives on the linkages between the household, production, the local and regional economies, and the international division of labour

* Discusses the present situation with respect to women in agriculture and recent trends in extension planning. States that improved agricultural extension for women can best be achieved through (a) careful analysis of gender issues within the overall extension service at both policy and operational levels and (b) consideration of the implications of this into practical measures. Effective work with women cannot be sustained in isolation from the general extension services and women stand to benefit from improvements in the organization and delivery of the service only if there is a stated policy on the particular needs of women. In the agricultural communities studied, the problem of basic amenities and infrastructure affect women in particular since they bear the responsibility for the home. Other problems relate to land issues and to credit, which are mainly obtained through men, and the serious consequences of this dependence. * Reviews the main features of the status of women in the agrarian structure of Latin America and the Caribbean in recent years. Chapter one surveys recent trends in the economic participation of rural women with special emphasis on the sexual division of labour in three types of production units, and on the work performed by women in agro-industry. The second chapter discusses some lessons learned as a result of two decades of programmes and projects for rural women. The analysis shows, inter-alia that projects and programmes for rural women must be: horizontally linked; self-sustaining; designed and executed on the basis of participatory methodologies; adapted to women's needs and to the existing division of labour by sex.

* Focuses on the status of women's education over the past decade. Contends that women now enjoy equality in years of schooling and that each Latin American country shows progress in respect of opportunities and in levels of schooling. Shows that at the primary and secondary levels, women have greater access to education but less at the post secondary level. Comments on the channelling of women into post-secondary courses with more flexible structures and where there is less chance of wage discrimination by sex. States that an analysis of school attendance by sex and age reveals equality of education with men. Contends that women now take good advantage of opportunities offered in campaigns and non-formal types of literary programmes and have obtained better literary levels than males. Observes that, despite the remarkable progress, women still do not achieve access to higher paying jobs in education and in administration. Attributes women's progress in education to the process of social and pedagogical change, and stimulating processes such as the International Women's Decade, and mass communication. Contends that education has ceased to play a role in determining the structure of the labour force by sex.

* Examines historical bias - the fallacy of female domination of teaching; patriarchal ideology; gender bias in the curriculum and the problems of co-education. Discusses the perpetuation of sexist beliefs and attitudes revealed in an analysis of English language textbooks used in schools and written for the Caribbean Examinations Syllabus. Appeals to teachers to address gender discrimination in all aspects of schooling, and to change outdated ideas and beliefs which limit the development and participation of women, and men, in healthy social relations. Concludes that laws provide equal rights for men and women, but the teaching of the meaning of equality of the rights and responsibilities of men and women in society is in the control of teachers and of schools.

* Considers the importance of human resources training and the factors which have contributed to gender based differences in the development of human resources. Examines the systems for manpower training, paying special attention to the status of women: the formal education system - secondary, vocational and higher education; the system for training human resources in general - education for the masses and adult education, vocational training for the employed, refresher courses and retraining; and the system for human resources training in the informal sector. Special importance is attached to human resources training in "gender studies" and outlines the activities of women's study programmes in the region. Concludes with recommendations.

* States that the rationale for the formation of the collective in 1983 was "the goal of training young urban, low-income women to work in the construction industry". Provides information on the number of women trained, the different areas of training and the methods by which training is performed. Outlines ways in which women are hired and provided with tools. Stresses that job placement services are not offered. Gives the origin of trainees and the method of selection as well as efforts used to disseminate information in the program. Provides data on the percentage of women who complete training and are able to find jobs; also gives the drop-out rate. Average salary is J$325 per week which is tied to the woman's skill level. Emphasises the status of the collective as well as the sources of funding and the costs involved in training each woman. Concludes that the major benefit of the collective is the opportunity given to women to improve their economic status.

* Outlines evaluating procedures of the project: timing, programming, methodology, purpose of final external evaluations, reporting and constraints. Describes the project environment in terms of institutional frame work, policy considerations, the need for women and development provision and the degree to which personnel, material, and financial input can enhance a sustained project through institution building, organisation and management. Analyses how staff development, teaching and training, documentation, research and outreach assist in accommodating short-term objectives and contribute to the overall policy, the University policy, and the Dutch policy for international co-operation. Observes that the project is a unique and complex experiment of support to a participative project among women organised in Women and Development Study groups trying to raise the level of awareness, in addition to stimulating teaching and research in women and development studies. Concludes that the experiment was successful. * The fourth in a series of contraceptive surveys carried out since 1974.
Covers data on contraceptive prevalence and also on related subjects associated with women and health. Specific areas covered are fertility and general factors which impact on fertility, infant and child mortality, maternal and child health, utilization of health facilities provided by government as well as the private sector, together with behavioural factors related to reproduction. Report summarizes the findings of the survey which are of major interest to policy makers and administrators of health and family planning programmes in Jamaica. In addition, recommendations made at a dissemination seminar held to evaluate the findings are included. Some highlights of the findings were: 1) there was almost universal awareness of at least one effective contraceptive method in all areas of Jamaica and among all socio-economic groups;
2) knowledge was higher for each method in 1989 than in previous years except for the rhythm method; 3) there was a fairly low level of correct knowledge of the reproductive cycle among all women observed; 4) those women who belonged to the established churches had higher correct knowledge as compared to those of the evangelicals; 5) only 70 per cent of the women surveyed had ever used a contraceptive method and the current usage was 55 per cent. Although knowledge of each method was higher in the urban areas than in rural areas, both past use and current use was higher in rural than in urban areas, a pattern not found in most countries.

* Provides an overview of the situation of women with respect to family planning, housework and child care. Focus on the need to design social policies for families with the aim of improving the living conditions of women in general, and in particular, those belonging to the most vulnerable groups in society. Presents some proposals and stresses the need for participation of women from two points of view: that of women as the principal users and beneficiaries of services, and that of women as individuals, who may contribute their experience and creativity to the search for new solutions to old problems. Three synoptic tables, one for each topic discussed, show the demand, supply, objectives, coverage and financing of the respective services - minimal requirements for the design of a policy in support of families.

* Based on discussions which took place during four seminars held by ECLAC under a research programme on family structure, female headship and the intergenerational transmission of poverty in developing countries, which was launched by the Population Council and the International Centre for Research on Women. Emphasis is placed on households and women who head them, rather than families, as it is recognized that households may have single, joint or multiple headship and house one or more families or a family and unrelated residents. Uses cross regional evidence and briefly discusses five questions relevant to research and policy: the usefulness of the concept of female headship; the social importance or significance of the female headship trend; the relationship between female headship and poverty; the welfare implications of female headship; and policy delimitations and options. Provides a summary of studies on poverty and welfare effects of women headed household as an appendix.

* Contends that the development process itself as practised in the "free world", militates against the attainment of equal rights by all. It does so by creating and/or supporting, and further institutionalizing family structures inimical to the equality of women, particularly of poor rural peasant women; in addition to ideological constraints and a lack of theoretical explication of family structures and of their effects on the attainment of full human development by all its members. * Investigates factors that cause low income women to register for prenatal care later than the first trimester of pregnancy, by conducting a survey among 225 women attending the Victoria Jubilee Hospital and another 50 in the environs of May Pen and Cassava Piece. Questions were designed to elicit information related to the following factors: 1) whether the women considered pregnancy a pathological condition; 2) whether the women were multiparous or primiparous; 3) the financial outlay involved; 4) blood donation at the hospital; 5) the attitude of the nurses; and (6) whether any of the women had sexually transmitted diseases. Findings confirm that only a small percentage (16 per cent) registered for prenatal care in the first trimester and that no one factor was responsible for this behaviour.

* Presents the findings of a study on the impact of health care delivery on women with gynaecological and obstetric problems. Interviews conducted with 80 women to examine their perceptions about their condition, the doctors and the nurses. On-the-spot non-participant observations of patient interaction with doctors and nurses are compared and assessed against patients' statements of their perceptions of the health care which was "given" to them. Identifies five areas of concern and looks at policy implications. The major problem of the public health care delivery service is not the lack of adequate numbers of doctors and nurses as is commonly perceived, but "the notion that health care is something that is given to people."

- * Malnutrition is one of the most significant problems of the day. Examines the nature of the problem and proposes the development of a new strategy. Identifies the nutrition goals for the 1990's as the control of protein-energy malnutrition and micronutrient deficiency disorders, and suggests a methodology for identification of appropriate action in a particular context through 'pre-packaged' technical interventions. The Conceptual framework emphasises the potential multisectoral nature of the problem, facilitates dialogue and co-operation among people of different professions, helps to identify what should be assessed and how causative relationships should be identified and analyzed. Also helps to clarify the objectives of the actions selected for implementation. Describes an approach by which households, communities and officials at the district and national levels can improve their capacity to use information for assessing, analysing and designing actions. Stresses the early development and establishment of nutrition information systems at all levels. Discusses the important components of a nutrition strategy and the actions to be taken in terms of whether they address the manifestations and immediate, underlying or basic causes of nutrition.

* Examines the incidence of domestic violence among Indo and Afro-Guyanese women. A study of Black women in Albouystown, Kitty and Lamaha Gardens in Georgetown, the mining town of Linden, the rural Black village community of Den Astel and Ithaca, a village estate community, in 1988. The sample consisted of 100 Black women who were either legally married or shared common law or visiting conjugal relationships with male partners. Fifty percent of the respondents were randomly selected from cases of wife-abuse reported to the police. The other half of the sample was randomly drawn from households within the survey communities. The focus of the sample afforded insights into the phenomenon while the randomly selected households provided inferences on the incidence of wife abuse in the communities surveyed. Data for East Indian women was gathered by a sample survey in several areas of Guyana. The phenomenon of violence was studied among both Indo and Afro-women within the context of the family. Some of the findings were: among both groups of women, drunk or drinking husbands were nearly ten times as likely to hit and twice as likely to sexually abuse their wives than when they were sober. Abused wives had few ideas on what to do to solve their problems. Most wives felt that they should try to understand and change their partners or ask friends and relatives to advise them. The least favoured courses of action were getting divorced or separated, committing suicide or murder and reporting husbands to police or social welfare agencies. An important difference between Black and East Indian couples is that the Black female is more likely to retaliate and inflict violence on her partner and also to initiate such violence.

Reflections on the women's movement in Trinidad: calypsos, changes and sexual violence.

In: Feminist Review, No. 38. 1991. pp. 33-47 General

-----&gt;JMISER

* Asserts that although women in Trinidad have made tremendous gains during the last two decades regarding equality in education, employment and remuneration, all women regardless of class, ethnicity, professional status or position have experienced varying degrees of violence, a particular control mechanism to ensure that women's freedom is still restricted. Notes the versatility of calypso, the oral song tradition of Trinidad, as a medium for portraying social events including gender relations, and the various forms of sexual violence daily experienced by women. Recognises that while most calypsonians are male, female performers as well as some males are challenging the popular stereotypes thus indicating awareness of present day concerns, as illustrated by some popular calypsos which challenge the male prerogative of philandering, beatings, exploitation and general disrespect for women. Portrays also the growing trend of women's independence and decreasing accommodation to male dictates. Reviews the feminist movement in Trinidad which begun in the late '70s, partially influenced by the UN International year of the Woman, by feminist writing (texts) and also by experiences of the global sisterhood. International funding facilitated the establishment of the National Commission on the Status of Women and also studies on varying aspects of women's lives. Discusses the work of CWP (Concerned Women for Progress), the first feminist group in Trinidad, emphasizing its role in awakening the society to issues pertaining to sexual violence whether wife battering, rape, incest, etc. and other legal disabilities experienced by women. Notes that CWP's successor, The Group, and its sister organisation, Working Women, also dealt with these issues. Identifies other landmarks resulting from the movement, such as the establishment of the Rape Crisis Centre (1984), HalfWay House for Battered Wives by Business and Professional Women (South Branch), and legislation of the Sexual Offences Bill (1986). Concludes that sexual violence is related to general social violence and suggests that the movement must begin to address the broader social issues confronting society from which violence generally and sexual violence specifically cannot be isolated.

Challenges the acceptance of a male-defined world marked by domination and calls for a transformed social order based on a balance of the "feminine principle of nurturing with the masculine principle of action".  * Based on case studies and working papers prepared for the Expert Group Meeting on Equality in Political Participation and Decision-making, Vienna, September 1989. States that where developments have taken place since 1989, for example in Eastern Europe, which have substantially changed the findings, more recent information has been provided. The focus is on women's participation in formal decision-making at the national level - in Parliament, in government, both the political executive and the higher ranks of the civil service, and equality in political decision making. Data analysed by geographic region. Analysis shows that with few exceptions, for example the Nordic countries, women are rarely found in the corridors of power. Suggests the characteristics that would be needed in a country for women to achieve equality in political participation and decision-making. Concludes that equality in political participation and decision-making is one of the major priorities for advancement of women into the 1990s, and without success in this area, other areas of advancement of women will be put at risk.

* Examines Caribbean law as it relates to the status of women, focusing on family law as well as on laws pertaining to education, employment, citizenship and nationality, criminal law. Highlights examples of progressive legislation, as in the Sexual Offences Act of Trinidad and Tobago; the Domestic Employees Act of Barbados; Legislation for Maternity protection, with a special focus on Dominica where maternity is protected on several levels - constitutional, by labour code and in specific legislation. Notes varying levels of regional commitment to reform in respect of citizenship and nationality laws, identifying St. Lucia, Dominica, Guyana and St. Vincent and the Grenadines as countries which have eliminated by law, discriminatory practices whereby citizenship by descent or registration is dependent upon the male partner. In all countries studied no restrictions by law exist to inhibit the right of education for Women. * Seeks to examine some features of Latin American culture and of feminine and masculine roles with a view to supporting the region's governments and national institutions in formulating their social agendas. Outlines some basic factors which will help to place its fundamental concern - recognition of the value of the feminine - in the cultural context of the region. Reviews how a history of conquest and racial convergence has shaped Latin American culture. Considers the patriarchal discourse of the western tradition and the effects of its confrontation with indigenous traditions. Questions to what extent did female dignity, traditionally manifested by indigenous women, affect Latin American culture? or, when both indigenous status and gender status are at issue, which gives rise to greater discrimination? and the relationship between traditional history and the memory of women of whatever origin. Analyses the dichotomy of public versus private life, the value of household work and its possible economic measurement, and modern society's devaluation of the so called "no man's land- the affective and caretaking roles. Concludes with prospects for action towards a new social paradigm in which the feminine and the masculine share the spaces in which they coexist, both private and public, in a more balanced manner.

* Discusses first the general perception of women and the traditional roles which they are assigned by the Church and society. Examines the relationship between Jesus and women citing examples from his life. Traces the history of the early Church examining references to women who had been ordained as deaconesses. Puts forward the argument that in spite of all that had been open to women in the early centuries, the process of "accommodation" nullified much that had been gained and women found themselves in positions that reflected little or none of the Gospel's freedom. Suggests that the church must come to grips with its attitude toward women, since it proposes political and vocational freedom in the secular world, but declares they should be subordinate in marriage and silent in the church. In attempting to speak of the role of women in the Church and in society presupposes that not only women but men also must recognise that woman is an equivalent human person. Recognises that the traditional man-woman relationship must change and women must seek and learn to be bonded together so that they can reach out, help each other and respond to the needs of others. States that there is a need for women to make a change. Lists a number of solutions presented to women to help change their situation: (1) prayer and meditation as a key force in developing clarity and authenticity;

(2) compassion, an attribute of God that helps a woman enter deeply into the experience of others; (3) solidarity - women must support, encourage and affirm each other in their struggle to create a better world; (4) creative imagination, - women have always been able to respond to needs that are not being addressed; and (5) sexuality, - they must create meaningful patterns of love. Expresses the hope that the Church, as it approaches the third Christian Millennium, follow a vision that is all embracing, and a philosophy that is rooted in the freedom and equality that is fundamental in the Good News.

* Seeks to identify and examine some images of women created by Jamaican artists in the area of popular music - reggae music - indigenous musical form from the 1960's to the 1980's. Also attempts to determine the extent to which these images may or may not have contributed to the norms of non-discrimination and equality. The investigation of the depiction of women in Jamaican popular music, utilized a content analysis of one hundred popular songs, selected on the basis of their popularity and coherent lyrics suitable for a systematic analysis. Findings support the opinion that the most persistent images of women were: a) women as sex-objects; b) women as house women; and c) women as dependents. Further analysis of the study showed that popular songs incorporated certain negative social stereotypes, and the images they create trivialize women. There were only a few positive references, and such references are usually to grandmothers, depicted as discerning in their advice. Another aspect of the study was a critique of the social impact of Reggae music. Concludes that reggae has failed to help to remove negative social stereotypes, rather it has perpetuate them.

* Summarises the discussions, papers presented and some of the most significant issues that arose at an expert meeting on the cultural aspects of the participation of women in Latin American and Caribbean development. The study first attempts to place the cultural debate on Latin American identities in the context of the current changes in the world situation, both at the political level and at the level of ideas, and to examine the resultant upheavals undergone by the Latin American ethos. Raises the question of culture as a genuine component of the development plans of the region, and deals with the subject of the presence of women, first in the traditional role which they have played in Latin American cultures and in their current role, within the process of transformation. In conclusion, briefly examines the interaction between cultures and the contribution which women have made and can make to a more advantageous participation by the region in today's changing world.

* Outlines the objectives of the Women's Consultation sponsored by the Church Women United and the Board of Missions of the United Methodist Church (USA). Explores to what extent these objectives have been met. Outside the Church women have made many gains, in the workplace and in the home, even though there still remains much to be done. Gives examples of what women have accomplished and what is still to be accomplished. Illustrates that women are making their presence felt within the various churches with their acceptance, in some cases, to some of the highest positions.

* The decade of the 1930s was one of serious labour disturbance throughout the region brought about by the international economic crisis and the workers resistance to the capitalist's strategies of economic restructuring. Throughout the region and in the cases discussed (Trinidad and Tobago, St. Vincent, Jamaica) women were important participants, being motivated by the need for economic survival. However their gains from these struggles are questionable. The increased emphasis on women as housewives in the social welfare programme denied women their right to be economically independent. Efforts aimed at strengthening the conjugal family denied the economic contribution which women made and reduced their possibilities to work. In addition, women's participation in the labour movement also became peripheral as emphasis was placed on "wage-workers" in the "responsible trade unions."

* Discusses the experiences of the Housewives Association of Trinidad and Tobago in its attempt to focus on consumer needs and the needs of women. It is implied that a lack of acceptance and understanding of the organisation's agenda and the group's movement toward pressure politics led partially to its failure. Members expressed an unwillingness to get into political activity and this fear of power, fear of political involvement equalled a loss of membership. Other problems were the limited number of members willing to share in the leadership of the organization, the lack of bonding relationships between the women within the organization and the survival and projection of the stereotype image of women by themselves and by the men in the society.

 * Traces the history of the Caribbean women's involvement in various types of organisations and therefore in the community. The study begins with the traditional practice of women being involved in religious-based organisations. It moves on to discuss their involvement in trade unions and political parties. However the re-emergence of the feminist movement in the late 1960s and early 1970s would see the formation of various women's groups throughout the Caribbean geared toward the needs of women. Some of these groups are, The Jamaica Association for the repeal of Abortion Laws (JARA), the Housewives Association of Trinidad and Tobago, Sistren Women's Theatre Collective and Women's Forum Barbados. The work of these groups and the formation of support groups such as the Caribbean Association for Feminist Research and Action (CAFRA) and the Women for Caribbean Liberation (WCL) give the impression of a well developed and effective women's movement. Concludes however that the achievement of these groups have only scratched the surface of the lives of Caribbean women.
