WOMEN IN DEVELOPMENT BIBLIOGRAPHY

1990

PART I: Abstracts and English Indices

PREFACE

This bibliography has been prepared on the subject of Women in Development which for many years has been treated as an area of emphasis by the member governments of the Caribbean Development and Cooperation Committee (CDCC). It is intended to complement the services of ECLAC/CDCC in the area of Women in Development, through the dissemination of information in this bibliography.

ECLAC/CDCC, Port of Spain extends its gratitude to Women in Development national focal points, non-governmental organizations, development agencies and individual researchers for sending bibliographical details of specific documents in the four main languages of the Caribbean region - Dutch, English, French and Spanish. The relevant abstracts have been prepared and the entries in the bibliography reflect this collaborative effort.

The bibliography includes non-Caribbean references which are relevant to Caribbean experiences and strengthen Caribbean information and analytical capacity concerning the subject of women in development.

The flow of publications in this area proceeds and as a result acquisition of bibliographical data continues. It is the intention of ECLAC/CDCC to publish updates from time to time, including the correction of errors and imperfections. Accordingly, feedback from users and notification of errors for rectification and improvement of future publications are welcome.

The 862 entries indicate the major women in development references in the Caribbean Information System for Economic and Social Planning (CARISPLAN). The sample entry indicates the elements of the format in which the records appear. Users seeking access to information closely related to women in development which is not included in this bibliography are invited to query the CARISPLAN data base for further reference.

Information is for action. With this bibliography ECLAC/CDCC, Port-of-Spain wishes to contribute in that direction.

INTRODUCTION

The present bibliography was prepared by the Women in Development (WID) Unit in close cooperation with the Caribbean Documentation Centre (CDC), both located at the United Nations Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean (ECLAC) Subregional Headquarters for the Caribbean. The publication reflects the significant growth of ECLAC's WID programme over the past five years, during which active acquisition has caused WID holdings at the CDC to increase from 171 to approximately 900 references.

The establishment of a database of these holdings was made possible through financial assistance of the United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM). The WID Unit gratefully acknowledges the massive and meticulous work performed by Audrey Chambers, who formulated the print format and tirelessly went through countless accuracy checks of records and publication lay-outs; Monique Lagro and Ghyslaine Neill, who trod the first bumpy path, trying to identify a large portion of the material; the contributions of Marilyn Jones, Cathy Shepherd and others, who at different times worked on indexing, abstracting and editing; Claire Stoessel, who provided the official translations of new terms; and last, but not least, the ECLAC/CDC staff member whose expertise was indispensable for completion of the project, when the database grew too large for the computer and when specific formatting of the project results presented complex problems.

The rationale for this publication is primarily to satisfy the frequent demands on the WID Unit for information, previously not easily accessible to enquirers. To this end, UNIFEM provided financial assistance for the project, "Publication of a Bibliography on Women (RLA/87/W03)", with the following objectives:

- (a) To facilitate project preparation and implementation by governmental and non-governmental organizations served by the programme;
 - (b) To improve the quality and raise the standards of research in the subregion; and
 - (c) To contribute to the establishment of a database on women in the subregion.

Participant feedback during the project's progress stimulated activities which enriched the quality of the database. In this regard, the decision to include as many comprehensive abstracts as possible, though time-consuming, proved an excellent one for the benefit of users. In addition to the Caribbean Information System for Economic and Social Planning (CARISPLAN) records on Women in Development, all Caribbean references acquired since initiation of the project and during the entire period of its implementation have been indexed. Abstracts appear in the original languages and a maximum of Caribbean references - published and unpublished - is included. The non-Caribbean references acquired in the context of the project appear with classifications and indexes.

Scope

The bibliography lists 868 references on Women in Development from the collections of libraries in CARISPLAN, a regional network for which the CDC serves as a co-ordinating centre.

Included are articles from serial publications, monographs and less widely distributed documents such as technical reports and conference papers.

While references to publications in English predominate, documents in the other three official languages of the Caribbean Development and Co-operation Committee (CDCC) - French, Spanish and Dutch - also appear.

Arrangement

The bibliography is divided into two main sections: the main entries and the indexes - author, subject, conference and geographic.

Main entries

Numbered consecutively, the entries have been classified into 15 broad subject categories (see Table of Contents) and are listed alphabetically by title within each category. A general category covers those documents which encompass more than two categories or which fall outside the assigned subject groups.

Four categories warrant further elaboration:

- (a) Family/Family Planning includes fertility, teenage pregnancy and female sexuality;
- (b) Politics includes feminism;
- (c) Culture includes communication, mass media, literature, religion and theatre;
- (d) Women's organizations includes governmental and non-governmental organizations;
- (e) Bibliographies includes documentation and information.

The Labour and Employment category contains with largest number of records (122) held by CARISPLAN in any one category. The predominance of Caribbean material in this category might be an indication of particular interest manifested in writing on that subject.

Indexes

The indexes offer alternative approaches to finding the material listed in the bibliography:

- (a) The subject index provides for alphabetical arrangement by descriptor or subject heading. The standard descriptors of the Macro Thesaurus are used. For specific subjects in the literature on women, the "ISIS International Women's Data Base" (Santiago, Chile, 1988) and "A Women's Thesaurus" (New York, 1988) were also consulted. The project has thus joined the effort of these publications to raise consciousness about language used to describe and locate information by and about women;
 - (b) The geographic index collocates items relating to a particular country or region;
- (c) The author index is arranged in alphabetical order by author, either persons, institutions or organizations, followed by the title of the documents in alphabetical order; and
- (d) The conference index indicates the name, date and place of conferences, meetings, seminars, workshops, etc., for which papers included in the bibliography were prepared.

Availability

The publication was prepared with UNIFEM computer facilities, MINISIS and Mini-Micro CDS/ISIS software at the CDC and, in the final stages, the WordPerfect 5.0 package was used.

The database will be distributed in the printed form of this bibliography and, upon request, on diskette to those agencies which wish to maintain an on-line copy on their microcomputers. The software programme required is the Mini-Micro CDS/ISIS package developed by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and available free of cost. The bibliography and the diskette are available free of cost through the WID Unit or the CDC, at UNECLAC, P.O. Box 1113, Port-of-Spain, Trinidad and Tobago.

Comments of users are welcome and will be taken into account during future up-dates.

INTRODUCCION

Esta bibliografía fue preparada por la Unidad Mujer y Desarrollo (WID) en estrecha cooperación con el Centro de Documentación del Caribe (CDC), ambos ubicados en la Sede Subregional para el Caribe de la Comisión Económica de las Naciones Unidas para América Latina y el Caribe (CEPAL). La publicación refleja el crecimiento significativo del programa WID en el transcurso de los últimos cinco años. Durante este período, gracias a un programa activo de adquisiciones, las existencias de WID en el CDC aumentó de 171 a alrededor de 900 referencias.

La creación de una base de datos de estas existencias se hizo posible mediante el apoyo financiero del Fondo de Desarrollo de las Naciones Unidas para la Mujer (UNIFEM). La Unidad WID agradece sinceramente el trabajo tanto pesado como minucioso de Audrey Chambers al elaborar el formato de impresión y verificar infatigablemente un sinnúmero de registros y esquemas tipográficos; agradece también a Monique Lagro y Ghyslaine Neill, quienes abrieron el camino identificando una gran parte del material; a Marilyn Jones, Cathy Shepherd y otros, por haber llevado a cabo trabajos de indización, abstracción y corrección; a Claire Stoessel, quien proporcionó las traducciones oficiales de términos nuevos; y de último en orden pero no en importancia, al oficial de la CEPAL/CDC cuya pericia resultó indispensable a la realización del proyecto, cuando la base de datos excedió la memoria de la computadora, y cada vez que la disposición tipográfica específica de los resultados del proyecto presentaba problemas difíciles.

El objeto principal de esta publicación fue la de atender a las solicitudes, cada vez más frecuentes, dirigidas a la Unidad WID para obtener información hasta entonces poco accesible a los solicitantes. Con este fin UNIFEM proporcionó apoyo financiero al proyecto "Publicación de una bibliografía sobre la mujer (RLA/87/W03)", cuyos objetivos fueron los siguientes:

- a) Facilitar la preparación y ejecución de proyectos por las organizaciones gubernamentales y no-gubernamentales beneficiarias del programa;
 - b) Mejorar la calidad y realzar las normas de la investigación en la subregión; y
 - c) Contribuir a la creación en la región de una base de datos sobre la mujer.

Las reacciones de los usuarios en el curso del proyecto estimularon actividades enriquecedoras para la base de datos. En este sentido, la decisión de incluir el mayor número posible de resúmenes integrales, aunque dicha operación demandara mucho tiempo, resultó de gran utilidad para los usuarios. Además del acervo bibliográfico sobre la mujer y el desarrollo del Sistema de Información del Caribe para la Planificación Económica y Social (CARISPLAN), todas las referencias caribeñas adquiridas desde el inicio del proyecto y durante todo el período de su ejecución fueron indizadas. Los resúmenes son en el idioma original y se incluye un máximo de referencias caribeñas - tanto publicadas como inéditas. Las referencias no caribeñas adquiridas en el curso del proyecto aparecen con clasificaciones e índices.

Alcance

La bibliografía contiene 868 referencias sobre la Mujer y el Desarrollo pertenecientes a los acervos de las bibliotecas que forman parte del CARISPLAN, una red regional para la cual el CDC sirve de centro de coordinación.

Se incluyen en ella artículos de publicaciones periódicas, monografías y documentos de distribución menos amplia, tales como informes científicos y ponencias de conferencia.

Aunque en la bibliografía predominan las referencias de publicaciones en inglés, figuran también en ella documentos en los otros idiomas oficiales del Comité de Desarrollo y Cooperación del Caribe (CDCC) - francés, español y holandés.

Organización

La bibliografía está dividida en dos secciones: las entradas principales y los índices - de autores, de materias, de conferencias y geográfico.

Las entradas principales

Las entradas, con numeración progresiva, han sido clasificadas en 15 categorías amplias (véase tabla de contenido) y están ordenadas alfabéticamente por título dentro de cada categoría. Una categoría general cubre aquellos documentos que pertenecen a más de dos categorías o que caen fuera de las categorías temáticas seleccionadas.

Cuatro categorías merecen una explicación más detallada:

- a) Familia/planificación familiar incluye fecundidad, embarazo de adolescentes y sexualidad de la mujer;
 - b) Política incluye feminismo;
 - c) Cultura incluye comunicación, medios de comunicación, literatura, religión y teatro;
 - d) Organizaciones de mujeres incluye organizaciones gubernamentales y no gubernamentales;
 - e) Bibliografía incluye documentación e información.

La categoria Trabajo y Empleo contiene el número más grande de registros (122) que posee el CARISPLAN en cualquier categoría. La predominancia de material atinente al Caribe en esta categoría puede señalar un interés particular por este asunto por parte de los investigadores.

Indices

Los índices ofrecen una selección de vías de acceso al material al cual se refiere la bibliografía:

- a) En el índice de materias se ordenan alfabéticamente los descriptores o encabezamientos. Se usan los descriptores estandardizados del Macrothesaurus. En lo referente a temas específicos de la literatura sobre la mujer, se consultaron también la "ISIS International Women's Data Base" (Base de Datos Internacional ISIS sobre la Mujer) (Santiago de Chile, 1988) y "A Women's Thesaurus" (Thesaurus sobre la Mujer) (Nueva York, 1988). Así se aunó el proyecto a los esfuerzos de estas publicaciones dirigidos a crear conciencia acerca del lenguaje usado para describir y localizar información producida por las mujeres y sobre ellas;
 - b) El índice geográfico reúne las referencias a un país o una región determinada;
- c) El índice de autores se ordena alfabéticamente por autor, sea éste una persona, una institución o una organización, y está seguido por una lista alfabética de los títulos de los documentos;
- d) El índice de conferencias da el nombre, el lugar y la fecha de cada una de las conferencias, reuniones, los seminarios, talleres, etc., en el cual se hizo la ponencia incluída en la bibliografía.

Disponibilidad

La publicación fue preparada mediante equipo electrónico del UNIFEM, la programación MINISIS y Mini-Micro ISIS en la sede del CDC y en las etapas finales se usaron los programas WordPerfect 5.0.

La base de datos será distribuida bajo la forma impresa de esta bibliografía y, a solicitud, sobre diskette a aquellas agencias que deseen mantener una copia en línea en sus microcomputadoras. El software requerido es el Mini-Micro ISIS desarrollado por la Organización de las Naciones Unidas para la Educación, la Ciencia y la Cultura (UNESCO) y disponible sin costo. Se puede obtener la bibliografía y el diskette gratis a través de la Unidad WID o el CDC, en la oficina de la CEPAL, P.O Box 1113, Port-of-Spain, Trinidad y Tabago.

Se recibirán con agrado los comentarios de los usuarios, y dichos comentarios se tomarán en cuenta en las actualizaciones futuras del documento.

INTRODUCTION

Cette bibliographie a été préparée par le Groupe "Intégration de la femme au développement" (WID) en étroite collaboration avec le Centre de documentation des Caraïbes (CDC), tous deux situés au siège sous-régional pour les Caraïbes de la Commission économique des Nations Unies pour l'Amérique latine et les Caraïbes (CEPALC). Sa publication reflète la croissance significative du programme WID de la CEPALC au cours des cinq dernières années. Pendant cette période, grâce à un programme actif d'acquisitions, le fonds WID du CDC a augmenté de 17 à environ 900 références.

Une base de données a été créée à partir de ce fonds grâce à l'appui financier du Fonds de développement des Nations Unies pour la femme (UNIFEM). Le Groupe WID exprime sa profonde reconnaissance du travail tant minutieux que volumineux réalisé par Audrey Chambers, qui élabora la disposition typographique et vérifia infatigablement d'innombrables registres et modèles typographiques; et remercie également Monique Lagro et Ghyslaine Neill, qui défrichèrent le terrain en identifiant une grande proportion du matériel; Marilyn Jones, Cathy Shepherd et autres, qui à divers moments effectuèrent un travail de catalogage, d'analyse et de correction; Claire Stoessel, qui fournit les traductions officielles des termes nouveaux; et en dernier mais non par ordre d'importance, le fonctionnaire de la CEPALC/CDC dont l'expertise s'avéra indispensable à la réalisation du projet, lorsque la base de données déborda de la mémoire de l'ordinateur, et chaque fois que la mise en page des résultats du projet présenta des problèmes complexes.

Le but principal de cette publication était de satisfaire aux demandes, de plus en plus fréquentes, adressées au Groupe WID en vue d'obtenir des informations jusqu'alors peu accessibles aux demandeurs. Dans ce but UNIFEM a fourni une assistance financière au projet "Publication d'une bibliographie sur la femme (RLA/87/W03)", dont les objectifs étaient les suivants:

- a) Faciliter la préparation et la mise en oeuvre de projets par les organisations gouvernementales et non-gouvernementales clientes du programme;
 - b) Améliorer la qualité et rehausser les normes de la recherche dans la sous-région; et
 - c) Contribuer à la création dans la région d'une base de données sur la femme.

Des retours d'information provenant des participants au cours du projet ont donné lieu à des activités enrichissantes pour la base de données. A cet égard, la décision d'inclure autant de résumés à dépouillement intégral que possible, quoique cette opération ait pris pas mal de temps, s'est avérée d'une grande utilité pour les utilisateurs. En plus des documents sur la femme et le développement enregistrés par le Système d'information des Caraïbes pour la planification économique et sociale (CARISPLAN), toutes les références caribéennes acquises au cours du projet sont accompagnées de classifications et indexes.

Envergure

La bibliographie comprend 868 références sur la Femme et le développement provenant des fonds des bibliothèques faisant partie du CARISPLAN, réseau régional dont le CDC sert de centre ordinateur.

Parmi les références se trouvent des articles de publications périodiques, des monographies et des documents de distribution plus limitée tels que rapports scientifiques et communications de colloque.

Si les renvois aux publications en anglais sont prédominants, font également partie de la bibliographie des documents dans les trois autres langues officielles du Comité de développement et de

Prèsentation

La bibliographie est divisée en deux sections principales: les entrées principales et les indexes - des auteurs, des matiéres, de colloques et géographique.

Entrées principales

Les entrées, numérotées consécutivement, sont classées en 15 catégories thématiques vastes (voir Tables des matières) et présentées par ordre alphabétique à l'intérieur de chaque catégorie. Une catégorie générale couvre ces documents qui touchent plus de deux catégories ou qui ne tombent dans aucune des catégories thématiques retenues.

Quatre des catégories méritent une discussion plus approfondie:

- a) Famille/planning familial inclut fécondité, grossesse d'adolescentes et sexualité de la femme;
 - b) Politique inclut féminisme;
 - c) Culture inclut communication, média, littérature, religion et théâtre;
 - d) Organisations féminines inclut organisations gouvernementales et non-gouvernementales;
 - e) Bibliographies inclut documentation et information.

La catégorie Travail et Emploi contient le nombre le plus élevé (122) de registres détenu par le CARISPLAN dans une seule catégorie. La prédominance dans cette catégorie de documentation portant sur les Caraïbes signale peut-être un intérêt particulier pour ce thème de la part des chercheurs.

Les indexes

Les indexes fournissent un choix de points de départ pour la recherche bibliographique:

- a) L'index idéologique offre une liste alphabétique des descripteurs ou des vedettes-matière. Les descripteurs employés sont ceux du Macrothésaurus. Pour ces thèmes spécifiques de la littérature sur la femme, la "ISIS International Women's Data Base" (Base de données internationale ISIS sur la femme) (Santiago, Chili, 1988) et "A Women's Thesaurus" (Thésaurus sur la femme) (New York, 1988) furent aussi consultées. Le travail s'ajoute donc aux efforts de sensibilisation de ces publications en ce qui concerne le langage employé dans la recherche et la description bibliographiques se rapportant aux affaires féminines;
 - b) L'index géographique rassemble les entrées portant sur un pays ou une région déterminée;
- c) L'index des auteurs est présenté par ordre alphabétique des noms d'auteur, qu'il s'agisse d'une personne, d'une institution ou d'une organisation, et suivi des titres des documents par ordre alphabétique; et
- d) L'index de colloques donne le titre, la date et le lieu des colloques, réunions, séminaires, ateliers, etc., lors desquels les documents figurant dans la bibliographie ont été présentés.

Disponibilité

La publication a été préparée moyennant l'équipement électronique d'UNIFEM et les logiciels

MINISIS et Mini-Micro CDS/ISIS au siège du CDC. Dans l'étape finale le progiciel WordPerfect 5.0 a été employé.

La base de données sera distribuée sous la forme de cette bibliographie imprimée, et, sur demande, sur disquette à ces organisations qui désireront garder une copie en-ligne sur leurs micro-ordinateurs. Le logiciel requis est le progiciel Mini-Micro CDS/ISIS élaboré par l'Organisation des Nations Unies pour l'éducation, la science et la culture (UNESCO) et disponible gratuitement. La bibliographie et la disquette peuvent être obtenues gratuitement, à travers le Groupe WID ou le CDC, au bureau de la CEPALC, P.O. Box 1113, Port-of-Spain, Trinité-et-Tobago.

Tout commentaire de la part des utilisateurs sera le bienvenu et sera pris en compte lors de la mise à jour de l'ouvrage.

General Location ----> CDC 9532 * Reviews development strategies pursued in the Commonwealth Caribbean since World War II and briefly considers their impact on the distribution of employment opportunities for men and women. It is generally accepted today that Commonwealth Caribbean countries will have to rely on external markets to provide much of the stimulus for their growth and development in the future. A worse state scenario of Caribbean economies in the late 20th century, based on current trends in the international economy, anticipates that they will remain export sectors passively incorporated into Abstract the international capitalist system, with essentially negative implications for employment and gender equity. An alternative strategy for structural transformation based on knowledge within the labour force, is proposed. Such a strategy, it is argued, is likely to be more gender-equitable. * [DEVELOPMENT STRATEGY] [EMPLOYMENT CREATION] [EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES] [CARIBBEAN REGION] Country/Region Descriptors

Portraits of Caribbean woman, drawn from the experiences of noted scholars and activists, embrace the four primary language groups: "Fighting Until the End", by Sonia M. Cuales, on the Dutch-speaking Caribbean islands; "A Journey in the Making", by Peggy Antrobus and Lorna Gordon for the English-speaking Caribbean; "Haiti: A Vacation Paradise of Hell", by Cacos La Gonaive, with specific emphasis on Haiti and a focus on the Dominican Republic by Magaly Pineda in "We Women Aren't Sheep," a contribution relevant to the Spanish-speaking Caribbean. Contributors document women's traditional roles in Caribbean society and examine current constraints to full equality and participation in the development process. Common to all assessments is a recognition of Caribbean women's resistance to the divisive constructs of language, history, geography and variegated cultural patterns in a sustained defiance of the options for separateness. Perspectives are more significantly directed towards a focus on the commonalities among Caribbean women, which could be potentially a powerful unifying force. These studies define for the Caribbean woman a route to progress which recognizes her past as the source of her strength, defiance and resourcefulness and a present full of dynamism and challenge.

Caribbean celebration: [report] / Sandra Edwards. Cave Hill: WAND, 1985. 91 p.

Caribbean Celebration: Decade for Women, Bridgetown, 29-31 March 1985. General

----> CDC 6916

* The celebration consisted of a workshop forum and a festival exhibition. The former consisted of eight workshops focusing on women as productive workers, women in social development, and women and the process of change. Each of these sections is preceded by an introduction and concludes with recommendations. Summaries of these papers are supplied in Appendix 1. With regard to women as productive workers findings revealed: that women in agriculture are regarded as invisible and the supply of support services, such as credit, marketing facilities, and storage, is inadequate. The attitude of rural women, particularly young women, towards agriculture and perceptions of their role in the agricultural sector and the society as a whole were negative. Recommendations focused on developing small-scale farming with government assistance; changing regulations and laws, and agricultural policy with regard to support services; and changing attitudes towards agriculture through a series of programmes such as workshops. Women and employment reveals that discrimination persists because of structural, attitudinal and self-imposed factors. The role of women is not regarded in national development and thus the interrelationship of social and economic factors is ignored. employment remains on the periphery of national development. Recommendations focused on defining women's relationship to production, enhancing women's self-perception as workers, introducing support facilities, and providing regulations to safeguard women's rights, women in social development. Discussed women and the formal education system, non-formal education for women, and woman-centred health care and family services. Findings include: the school curriculum made no explicit differentiation by sex yet little effort was made to discourage students from gravitating towards traditional male/female streams; constraints of staff and money; need for a positive self-image; and for accreditation of non-formal Recommendations included: programmes to education. reorient students to non-traditional options, closer co-ordination and co-operation among all agencies working on women's issues; supplying support and half-way services; provide information on laws, policies and services; and implement public education programmes. Women and the process of change discusses mechanisms for social change; women, the media and communications; and women in culture.

The article discusses the initiatives, activities, strategies and research emanating from the region as a result of the UN's decade focus on, "one half of the world's population". The constraints which prevent full recognition of women's contribution to their societies are discussed but the overriding constraint is the deeply rooted attitudes which persist in denying that women have any other contribution to make to society but their sexuality and their reproductive ability.

- * Against a background of political "flag" independence, and a black bourgeois government as yet devoid of indigenous political consciousness, the article describes the status and participation of women in the Caribbean. Women are seen as generally marginalized by sex-role stereotyping, which defines the nature and content of their education and the nature and value of their productive labour. To avoid stereotyping, a synoptic portrait of different female types is given e.g., the market woman/higgler/vendor, domestic helper, doctor, housewife etc. The article concludes with a description of the growth of Caribbean female self-discovery and the formation of women's groups, such as WAND (Women and Development Unit of the University) and the Sistren working-class theatre collective in Jamaica.

* The study focuses on the decision-making power of women within the same class and across class lines. The data contradict common assumptions about the relationship between women's class position and the exercise of power. Findings indicate that economic contributions have little to do with increased female status. What is found to be significant is the degree to which women internalize the ideology of male dominance. The author notes that though both middle-class and working-class women perceive males as dominant and male activities as more important than their own, the more frequent absence of males from working-class households gives working-class women more decision-making power by default.

• The paper examines gender relations in the Caribbean from slavery to the present, placing the analysis of gender within the concept of race and class. Argues that the dominance of race, colour and class in Caribbean colonial society, made the issue of gender peripheral to an understanding of power, dominance and change. While race and class remain central concerns in the post-independence era, independence sharpened the contradictions in gender relations. Concludes that women's subordination and exploitation in the Third World in general, cannot be divorced from the wider issue of inequality in the world system and the

- * Since Independence from the United Kingdom in 1962 there have been equal educational and economic opportunities for women. During the period of the oil boom, 1974 to 1981, these were taken up avidly by women, with equal school enrollment at primary and secondary levels for females. Males and females are equally entitled to selection for entry into secondary, technical, vocational or university level education. There are no general restrictions on women working. Women, however, are concentrated in underpaid sectors like that of domestic service but there are no real obstacles to female entry into predominantly male dominated professions other than those caused by poverty or cultural restrictions. At present men and women enjoy equality in law to a great degree. Anomalies do exist and for the most part affect women who because of poverty or lack of education may be unable to fully exploit their privileges. Women have benefitted through other developments in the society, such as through the Family Planning Association. Political power and political life though not closed to women have been largely dominated by men. The reasons for this may be largely cultural as many women feel unwilling to get into the political sphere. Over the years there has been the growth of a large, articulate and economically secure group of women as seen in the various areas of employment where women are visible: magistrates, lawyers, journalists, doctors, media workers. Women have also very easily entered the predominantly male occupation of taxi driving without any discouragement from male taxi drivers. Nevertheless, there is a backlash felt by all women regardless of class, ethnicity, professional standing or position whereby, violence is used as a mechanism for controlling women.

Lionheart gal: life stories of Jamaican women / edited by Honor Ford-Smith; Sistren. London: Women's Press, 1986. xxi; 298 p.: illus. General

----> CDC 9430

* A collection of testimonies blended to produce a collage of Caribbean womanhood, Lionheart Gal claims no affiliation to any of the contemporary theories of feminism; rather it dissects universal woman and extracts that part that is peculiarly Caribbean, particularly Jamaican, and recognizable by its unique history and tales of suffering, joy and struggle. The stories echo across the last forty years of Jamaica's history, and in Ford-Smith's words reverberate "with the impact of so called 'development' on women." Reflections from earlier times present Ni, the Maroon leader of the eighteenth century to provide comparisons and contrasts that define the Jamaican woman today. The tone for the book's theme of courage and struggle and developing consciousness is set in Ford-Smith's introduction in which the heroic character and exploits of Ni, also known as Nanny the Maroon, are juxtaposed with the stereotypical subservience of the Caribbean woman portrayed as nanny, "instinctively maternal, perpetually self-effacing, kind-hearted and loving, the complacent servant who loved her oppressor". Concludes that these two images may not, in fact, be as opposite as they may at first appear to The stories, as testimonies of real-life experiences. perpetuate the tradition of oral history and cover a wide range of women's experiences which are underscored by discriminatory practices: labour, migration, sexuality. It defines and makes distinct new theories on Caribbean feminism.

Mechanisms that contribute to the maintenance of discrimination against women and ways of promoting their equality in Trinidad and Tobago / Lynette Seebaran, Joaquin St. Cyr. Port of Spain: s.n., 1987. iii; 64 p.: tbis. General> CDC 7232

* The women of Trinidad and Tobago are still socialized into a pattern of behaviour of dependence on the male, their social status depending on their marriage partners, not on their own achievements. Discrimination against these women is thus rooted more in the attitude, images and the conditioning, from birth, of women and men into feminine and masculine roles respectively, rather than overtly blatant discrimination such as might be embodied in laws or regulations. Few women therefore, have, enjoyed power or authority in the public realm such as politics, trade unions, or other formal organizations in Trinidad and Tobago. In order to eliminate discrimination, it is recommended that a national policy on women compatible with the overall national development strategy be formulated. The structure, manpower, funding and other resources of national machinery for women must be strengthened. The educational system must be reformed to encourage women to participate in the full range of subject options in the secondary and post secondary school system; more facilities ought to be provided for the training of women at the technical and vocational level and a systematic examination of the curriculum material in schools be undertaken to eliminate gender stereotyping. Women must also be encouraged to enter the more remunerative industrial, commercial and managerial activities. Legislation ought to be reformed especially in the areas of divorce and family law, domestic violence and sexual harassment or sexual prejudice in the workplace.

Indigenous cultural values must form the core of a national ethos and the nucleus of any form of social reconstruction, even revolution, should be the people of the village community. The report presents case studies of three of these: the Women's Centre, the St. Elizabeth Bammy Project and the Sistren Theatre Collective. The Women's Centre, is the first attempt in the Caribbean to deal with the problem of uninterrupted education among young women, due to early pregnancy. The Bammy Project aims at harnessing unemployed skilled resources for cassava processing. * Symposium presentations examined a broad range of issues including: women and employment, health, education and women and the media as they relate to the Jamaican experience and also looked at some of the events and developments affecting women regionally and globally. The symposium reports represent a stock-taking exercise at the end of the UN Decade and observes that despite the strides made in the establishment of some women's support systems, major problems still exist. In education, concerns are raised on the issues of curricula stereotyping, lack of opportunity for women to develop entrepreneurial skills, deficiencies in training in marketable skills, insufficient exposure to non-traditional areas and the perpetuation of the subordination of women in Jamaica fostered by the socialization process. Employment concerns relate to a continuing ignorance among many women of their rights as workers, the absence of women in high ranks of the trade union movement and negative effects of the 807 programme and the Free Zone system. The health issues focus on stress-related diseases and ill-health resulting from strenuous working conditions. A paper by journalist Barbara Gloudon expressed concern with the abuse of the dignity and image of women in media presentations. This, the paper observes, continues to undermine women's positive role in family and society. Makes an appeal against misrepresentation, stereotyping and the use of women as images and subjects for commercial gain.

Obstacles to the implementation of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women: social and cultural factors: Barbados, Dominica and Guyana / Myrtle D. Bishop; Unesco. Bridgetown: Unesco, 1987. v; 157 p.: tbls. General

* Consists of two sections, the first one dealing with individual reports on Barbados, Dominica and Guyana and the second section which summarizes the preceding country reports. Identifies the social and cultural factors which perpetuate discrimination against women in these countries and provides recommendations for dealing with the situation. In all three countries, women have played an important role in the agricultural sector which has provided employment for a large number of women. Other traditional posts held by women in these countries include domestic service, cottage industry, clerical, teaching and nursing. At all levels of employment there has been sexual discrimination with regard to the remuneration for men and women. In all three countries the majority of income-earning women perform a double-shift in that after completing income-earning activities they must then tend to the household operations. The obstacles to women's attainment of equality with men are largely rooted in traditional ideologies and patterns of behaviour which are reflected in the social and economic structure in which they operate. The traditional value system places great emphasis on male dominance and leadership in public places and family, at the same time according low status to the reproductive role of women. Recommendations proposed suggest the need for changes in the attitudes of both men and women which can influence male/female relationships, the assignment of roles within the household, teaching practices, educational material, the choice of educational courses by females and other activities associated with the educational system and practices at the workplace. The establishment of a system to monitor the situation of women, the provision of adequate supporting services and the effective use of mass media is also proposed.

Obstacles to the implementation of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women: social and cultural factors: English-speaking Caribbean countries / Myrtle D. Bishop; Unesco. Bridgetown: Unesco, 1987. 45 p. General

* Identifies the social and cultural factors which encourage the continuation of discrimination against women in the English-speaking Caribbean. Women in these countries have always worked, occupying traditional posts such as nursing and teaching and thereby remaining virtually non-existent in managerial and administrative posts traditionally reserved for men. Legislative measures enacted by the Governments of these countries have somewhat improved the situation of women, but the situation varies from country to country. The survey reveals that the obstacles to women's attainment of equality with men are largely rooted in traditional value-systems and patterns of behaviour which places great emphasis on male dominance and leadership in public places and the family, at the same time according low status to the reproductive roles of women. Women employed outside of the home are in fact working a double shift in that they are also responsible for household operations. There is a need for changes in the attitude of both men and women which can influence male/female relationships, the assignment of roles within the household, teaching practices, educational material, the choice of educational courses by females and other activities associated with the educational system and practices at the workplace. Recommendations have been proposed such as the establishment of a system to monitor the situation of women, the provision of adequate support services, selected legal issues, the effective use of the mass media and the establishment of bipartite machinery to facilitate discussions on issues relating to women as members of the labour force and improving the ability of Government Departments and non-Governmental organizations to deal effectively with issues.

Rights of women: workbook of international conventions relating to women's issues and concerns / International Women's Tribune Center. New York, NY: International Women's Tribune Centre, 1983. [160 p.] General ----> CDC 7103

* Workbook is divided into four sections. The first section explains the meaning and importance of International Conventions, describing how they are made and "come into force" and suggesting how they can be used to enhance the condition of women in a country. Also includes a glossary of terms and a country chart on which can be recorded whether one's country has signed and/or ratified the 44 conventions. In the second section are separate worksheets for 17 UN and one UNESCO convention which are of relevance to womer., and these are arranged by subject matter. Each worksheet gives the names of the convention and its purpose. A very brief summary of those parts of its contents most important to women is included along with provisions for implementing the Includes also information about when the Convention. Convention was adopted; the number of countries which signed the draft: the date it entered into force and the number of ratifications which had to be filed to make its provisions legally binding and the number of countries which had ratified the Convention by 31 March 1983. Following this information are a series of questions to be answered which will make clear the status of the Convention in one's country. Chart appearing at the conclusion of the section record each country's position on each of the 18 Conventions. In the third section, twenty-six ILO Conventions which primarily relate to work conditions and employment rights of women are presented. Role of women in the development process: Jamaica (with special reference to the role of rural women) / A.J. Wint. Kingston: IICA, 1980. 95 p.: tbls. General ----> JMNPA

* Seeks to provide information to assist in solving the many-faceted problems of women in development. Elicits from statistical data between 1970 and 1978 that though there are more women than men in the population, there are far more males in the labour force; a higher percentage of the male labour force than of the female is employed; generally women tend to be employed below their potential. Uses the criteria of family, education and religion to show how the social system impacts on women. Discusses briefly: legislation of the 1970's which sought to improve women's condition; political and administrative appointments of women; women's organizations; some programmes to improve women's competence. Looks at areas of employment, home economics syllabuses in educational institutions and government ministries; the achievements of the Women's Bureau - established to improve the status of women. Decides that Jamaican women are leaders in their community and should no longer be kept on the periphery of socio-politico-economic development. Rural women are strongly motivated by the desire to achieve social mobility for their children. Despite theoretical equality, women are treated as second class citizens and must find ways to change this situation. Lists several avenues through which they could participate more meaningfully in national development. Concludes that appropriate data are urgently needed to facilitate a precise assessment of the status of women.

show the dangers of arbitrarily transplanting to Latin America goals proper to the struggle of women's movements in the developed countries. Part 2 concentrates mainly on the particularities of various countries e.g. the legal status of women in Colombia or the way the present regime in Chile has made political use of the traditional image of women; specific issues in Uruguay, the French West Indies and Mexico; and conditions in a maternity hospital in Venezuela.

* The Suriname Government has set itself the objective of establishing a new social order based above all, on the equality of all citizens regardless of race, religion, sex or civil status. In implementing this objective, it had established a national advisory council for women's liberation, to advise on the development and improvement of governmental policy, as well as on the legal measures to be taken to ensure equality of rights and opportunities in the fields of education, work and social welfare. The Government had repealed the law limiting the legal capacity of married women and had set up a committee to establish an inventory of the provisions of fiscal law, labour legislation and nationality law, which perpetuated inequality between men and women, and to review agreements in connection with equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value; maternity protection and discrimination in respect of employment and occupation. On the practical level, the Government had built day-care centres to assist working mothers, and schools, health services and water supply systems were established in rural, isolated areas, in an effort to eliminate urban/rural inequality.

- * Paper presents an overview and critique of recent trends in research, which incorporate gender into sociological studies on class, status and social mobility. Emphasis is placed on an examination of the crisis in social mobility of women, their occupational status and the class parameters which impact upon women's participation in the development process. Author confronts one of the major controversies in research which concerns the relevant unit of analysis for the study of class and status: individual, household or larger collectivity. Draws parallels between the separation of the individual from the household and the process of separation embodied in the capitalist mode of production. Supports the concept which considers production in its totality as a process of reproduction, involving biological reproduction This, combined with individual production childrearing. outside of the household, contributes to the formation of social class structures. Analysis based on studies of male mobility; comparisons between conventional research methodologies and new approaches which consider men and women as independent subjects; the interdependence of partners and the position of the individual and household in studies of class.

- * The status of women in Middle America, Caribbean and South America is examined. Statistical data are presented and analyzed on the demography of the region, women's literacy and education, labour force participation, marital status, fertility and mortality. Some of the conclusions drawn were: (1) birth rates do not vary significantly by subregion, but differences in population growth are due to variations in fertility and international migration; (2) women more often select 'traditionally feminine' professions in spite of opportunities to enter other professions at university level: (3) an accelerating movement of women into paid employment in the formal sector exists; (4) women headed households are more prominent in the Caribbean; (5) women in countries with large European populations prefer legal unions, whereas their peers of Hispanic and Afro-Caribbean origin enter consensual unions in their youth and legal unions in their mature years; (6) motherhood and family responsibilities frequently account for women's prestige in Latin America and the Caribbean; (7) women have general advantages over men as far as mortality is concerned.

- * Stresses that Caribbean feminism was not imported from Europe and North America in the 1970s. Argues that there are common misrepresentations regarding the role of women in Caribbean history. Utilizing the examples of Nanny, the Maroon warrior leader, and the case of the slave women at the time of Emancipation, the tradition of female leadership of the Caribbean women is illustrated. Argues that the status of housewife is a relatively new image in the Caribbean. The activities of the slave women and the working class woman clearly refutes the housewife ideology. Points out that the first significant reforms for women in the twentieth century came after the waves of protests and demonstrations of 1918 and 1919. Various cultural and political organizations like the Group and the Working Women for Social Progress (W.W.S.P.) in Trinidad, and the Committee of Women for Progress (CWP) and Sistren in Jamaica are cited. States that none of the early organizations challenged the image of woman as housewife. Also that although their activity in protest was strong, their absence from leadership meant that many of their demands have either never been achieved or have taken fifty years to achieve. Points out that the housewifization of the black Caribbean woman has accelerated to unprecedented heights. The argument is that riots are caused by instability which is caused by a lack of proper family life, a well-defined programme of social work, and an elevation of the status of women. Thus the woman's role has continued to be defined first and foremost by their obligation to the home. Concludes that women's position cannot be said to be improving in any linear way. Major watersheds of social change in the Caribbean have not necessarily affected women as automatically or as beneficially as is often assumed.

- * The conclusion of the United Nations' Decade for Women, 1975-1985 has presented opportunities not only for taking stock for the actual condition of women in respect of their progress toward development and equality, but also the re-examination of theories which have informed strategies of economic, social and political development in human society generally. As a contribution to this latter task, this paper argues for a people-centred rather than merely growth-centred approach to development. It calls for the adoption of "non-formal and participatory methodologies" to effectively integrate women into the processes and rewards of economic and political development.

* Feminist theory must be seen as an expression of the social, economic and political context within which it emerged as well as a synthesis of past intellectual traditions. With this in mind, the paper sheds some light on the critique of white Anglo-Saxon feminist theory by Black and Third World feminists. Most feminists agree that a sexual division of labour exists in every human society; most feminist anthropologists agree also that in all known kinship based societies there is a gender hierarchy based on male dominance. What feminists do not agree on is the root/cause/basis of male dominance or 'patriarchy'. Patriarchy denotes a structural system of male domination which represents an analytical advance and constitutes the essence of feminist theory. Four approaches within feminist theory are analyzed critically. The first sees the basis of patriarchy in either female or male biology; the second sees the basis of patriarchy in social and material relations; the third treats patriarchy as an ideological structure; and the fourth rejects patriarchy in favour of an alternative conceptual framework - the social relations of gender.

* Reviews the Integration of Women in Development Approach (its theory and practice) which formed the dominant activities of the Decade. Asserts that this approach was misdirected and suggests that its inadequacies stem from an incomplete understanding of women's subordination. Contends that if the totality of women's concerns are to be effectively addressed, then relevant development planning must be grounded in a discourse based on an understanding of class structures, of modes of production and distribution and the ways in which these combine with masculine dominance to reinforce women's subordination in the Caribbean.

* Questions project design, methodology and evaluation. Of nine specific project reports the following examples are given: the effect of family life education on contraceptive use and pregnancy among teens, St. Kitts-Nevis; reducing teenage pregnancies in St. Lucia; and the feasibility of operating adolescent clinics in Dominica. Projects involved family planning officials and health personnel at the administrative and field level. Problems occurred in both these project formulation and design phases. The easy abandoning of objectives, lack of pilot surveys, inadequate training, and sloppy research indicated a lack of details on how to achieve objectives, of knowledge of the factors involved and accurate data, and of testing or assessing means. Concludes that there was no relation between objectives and implementation. Problems with project design implementation could have been avoided if attempts were made to incorporate Caribbean researchers. States that the conference had left the impression that researchers had spent considerable resources attempting to address rapid population growth, but after four years, they had come no closer to understanding the problems and therefore, were unable to prescribe solutions.

* A description and analysis of a procedure towards obtaining information directed at increasing participation in economic and social development, nationally and regionally are given. A multi-level method is used integrating the standard sociological structured survey sample and anthropological unstructured in-depth interviewing techniques. Three levels of interviewing were conducted. Round 1 employed a questionnaire administered to 1526 women in three research sites, Antigua, Barbados and St. Vincent dealing with demography, education, family and kinship, work, and organization and group membership. Round was designed to gather quantitative data on everyday experiences like work, support systems, relationships vis-a-vis men and other women, attitudes and perceptions of themselves and coping with daily activity. Round 3 involved the use of varied data collection techniques, from participant observation to group discussion interviews in Barbados, Antigua, Grenada, St. Kitts, Dominica and St. Vincent on problems selected for further investigation based on findings from Round 1. The problems of integrating scattered personnel and resources, the integration of the project into local communities and the uncovering of relevant data on Caribbean women involved the formulation of ideas, the identification of research problems. the designing of data collecting instruments and the creation mechanisms for their implementation multi-disciplinary team effort. Cases are mentioned and some findings referred to are: that it is common for paternal relatives to be involved in the case of children born in visiting unions, that male partners are often the ones who encourage birth control, and that men support and encourage their partners to assume responsibility irrespective of marital status. Training methods for interviewers are outlined in detail. Supervision and reinterview methods are explained.

- * Briefly sketches elements to be considered in any attempt to analyze women's position in society. Defines 'gender' as the socially acquired characteristics of masculinity and femininity; 'gendering' as the complex process by which gender is acquired; and the 'social relations of gender' as the socially constructed behaviours enacted between men and women. A basic premise of feminism is that the relation between men and women is essentially a power relation in which women have less power. Argues that using the 'social relations of gender' as a conceptual tool has the merit of revealing the existence of women's power and avoiding the pitfalls of overstressing the ability of all men to coerce women in all circumstances. There is a need to analyze women's situation from a number of perspectives and to strive for a holistic view. Psychosocial, socio-biological and socio-political referents for further research are discussed.

* Demonstrates the usefulness of the pilot survey in data collection by examining the methodology and select findings of the Women in the Caribbean Project pilot survey which was conducted as a means of testing the interview schedule of the final survey. The survey was designed to provide insights into the life experiences of Caribbean women from their own perspective and the interview schedule took the form of a series of sector studies covering household composition, demographic characteristics, education, family and kinship, work activities and organization and group membership. The pilot survey demonstrated the suitability of the questionnaire as a method of data collection; pointed out inadequacies in the questionnaire such as duplicated or ambiguous questions and the need to expand the original age-range; and facilitated the anticipation of problems which would arise in the field. Four general recommendations arising from the selected findings are: the need for a programme to encourage the removal of role stereotypes; the need for women's attitudes to change regarding the ideal-typical role of male breadwinner; the need for programmes aimed at increasing women's involvement in capital-intensive activities; and the need to encourage women's participation in formal politics.

* Proposes new directions in research based on accepted new knowledge of the significance of gender determinants in secio-economic and political analyses and urges the inclusion of the theoretically and methodologically challenging element of race within the purview of class analysis. Argues that the proposed intellectual stock-taking would be more pertinent to the current imperative to determine how each mechanism of oppression in the class/race/gender conundrum impinges on the other and determines the way in which the other is experienced. From this basis, the writer suggests there would emerge clearer perspectives on the status of the Caribbean woman in relation to work and economics, politics, power and organization as well as in relation to developments in science and technology. Role of women in rural development: the Rose Hall experience: bottom-up development in action / Patricia Ellis. St. Michael: WAND, 1983. 29 p.: map, tbls. General ----> CDC 5756

- * Objectives were to: 1) develop a model of 'bottom-up development' which would influence official government policy in planning and designing national programmes to ensure the full participation of women at all levels in the process of national development; 2) engage rural women in a process of development through which they would examine their economic and social contribution to the development of their community, develop their ability to take leadership and decision-making roles in the community, and generally improve the quality of their own lives and that of their community. The most important feature of the project is said to be the degree and the extent to which large numbers of community members have participated in collecting and analyzing information and in all stages of planning, organizing and implementing community projects and activities. Through their participation they have become aware of their abilities and have gained self-confidence and improved self-esteem. A note to funders is that if they are serious about community participation in development projects, they need not only channel funds to local agencies etc., but also to consider and adopt more flexible and open approaches and conditions for funding, more realistic timeframes for developments, more creative user-based assessment of programmes, etc.

- * Begins with the premise that an analysis of the history of class formation, racial and ethnic composition and relations with the metropolitan countries, is essential to an understanding of gender relations in Caribbean society. Defines 'gender' as the social construction of femaleness and maleness and elaborates the Marxist theory of social class with reference to women's position in society. Some theories have likened the relationship between class inequality and gender inequality, to a marriage. The author suggests that this relationship is almost a 'visiting relationship' in the Caribbean.

Structures of experience: gender, race and class in the lives of two Indian women in Trinidad / Patricia Mohammed. Cave Hill: UWI. Women and Development Studies Project (Cave Hill, BB), 1989.

Women and Development Studies. Disciplinary Seminar, 2 - Social Sciences: Women, Development Policy and the Management of Change, St. Michael, 3-7 April, 1989. General ----> CDC 9561

* Life stories drawn from the experiences of two Trinidadian women of East Indian descent whose contrasting background and social status form the backdrop for an investigation of the gender, race and class dialectic: How do factors of birth, social status, family, life chances and experiences influence a woman's life. The women chosen for the case studies are Dropatie Naipaul, mother of author V.S.

Naipaul, who by birth is a member of one of the oldest and most prestigious Indian families in Trinidad; and Ruth Dassie Parsan, born Ruth Dassie Singh of Trinidad-born Indian parents in the then largely rural district of El Socorro, now an active commercial centre and working-class urban district bordering the fertile agricultural area of Aranguez. Mrs. Naipaul is 25 years older than Mrs. Parsan. Their lives have varied, not only as a result of circumstances of birth - one is Brahmin, born into a wealthy and prestigious family; the other married beneath her caste and has known great poverty and deprivation, but also because they were born and grew up in different parts of Trinidad. Their perceptions of race, class and society differ, but each holds on to the common factor of their uniqueness as Indian women conforming to the conventions of their tribe. Author sees the need for feminists and sociologists to note the message drawn from the lives of these two women. The interviews indicate that while their lives revolved around different social circumstances, their adherence to tradition with respect to male/female and family relationships remained similarly intact. They have not, however, been passive actors within the constructs of their lives. They are seen to be at times adept at making a virtue of necessity and at others capable of determining their own goals. Each woman, the author concludes, is still the product of her race and class and assigned gender role, while at the same time their life histories illustrate a defiance of common expectations of them as members of these specific groups.

* Prior to 1980, research relevant to women was carried out by social anthropologists and demographers with little focus on their problems and needs. Current research centres on providing a clearer understanding of women's lives. Policy-makers in the public sector have been targeted as having the greatest potential for generating change. Although women are increasingly occupying higher level technical and administrative positions, women's issues are seen as having low status and so have not been properly addressed. Projects aimed at redressing this have been conducted by the University of the West Indies through the Women in the Caribbean Project of the Institute of Social and Economic Research and the Women and Development Unit. New relationships between research and teaching, influenced by the feminist movement can be seen in the work of Sistren Theatre Collective of Jamaica and the Caribbean Association for Feminist Research and Action (CAFRA). A third phase of research is seen in the work conducted by CARICOM and

* Attempts to focus on some important areas of change related to roles and relationships between women and men within the Caribbean - within the home, the education system, the media, and the wider society. The preamble is that to promote further changes in the relationships and to build a more caring society, both parties need to be released from existing stereotypes. Sessions are structured to promote maximum participation of the individual within the small groups. Each is designed to draw on the experiences of all participants, to encourage each person to express feelings, ideas, attitudes and to build greater awareness of how these affect behaviour. An underlying principle of these sessions is that change will not occur unless the individual perceives the need for change. An attempt is therefore made to highlight conscious/unconscious attitudes and values and to help the individual to understand the process by which these are shaped. Another premise on which training sessions are developed is that most of the participants are seriously concerned about becoming more effective youth and community workers. The module therefore provides the opportunity for individuals to review their own behaviour and consider alternatives. Each topic has the following format: topic, objectives, materials, activities, outcomes.

Women and agricultural change in Latin America: some concepts guiding research / Fiona Wilson

----> CDC Serial

* One is not yet in a position to draw simple conclusions from the existing research literature in answer to the question of how the lives of rural women are affected by the process of commercialization in agriculture. The most serious problem inhibiting generalization has been the underlying conceptual and political differences among commentators. This article explores and illuminates these conceptual differences, discusses the basic weakness of the 'impact model' (of agricultural change on women) most commonly adopted up to now, and indicates directions taken by alternative conceptualizations that stress the interplay of relations of gender with relations of class and ethnicity.

* Examines the psychological impact on women of existing social structures, traditions and cultural values, alongside the realities of women's identity and consciousness. A class perspective on the issue indicates the boundaries of income levels, occupation and male-derived status which combine to create differences in behaviour and attitudes between women across the class spectrum. A challenge is presented to feminist scholarship to address major questions pertaining to class and gender studies. Among these being issues of whether there are inherent differences in the quality of life between working class and middle class women; whether teenage mothers experience adverse effects from early motherhood. The balance between occupational reality and family life of female politicians. Urges, as well, consideration of other factors relevant to the experience of the Caribbean: economic conditions, migration, overseas economic support to households, and developing trends in drug abuse, teenage prostitution and crime.

Analyzes the power-subordination relationship between men and women and the condition of women on the basis of four major characterizations: bio-gender-universal; gender-status-universal; gender-status-stratum-specific; and gender-status-specific. - * Details the major objectives of the project which are to: (1) identify the subjective meaning of the social realities which women face, the way these realities are manifested and the consequences at the individual, community and societal level; (2) devise a theoretical framework which would integrate the analysis of women's roles as they are affected by processes of social change; (3) generate data relevant to policy making for women; (4) identify appropriate mechanisms for the dissemination of research results and for incorporating these results into ongoing development programmes; and (5) produce a cadre of women who would be adequately equipped with the necessary research skills to conduct good research in general. In summary, the project was conceived as an exploratory attempt to identify the broad spectrum of issues confronting women as defined by the women themselves.

* According to the main findings of the workshop, women are disadvantaged for a number of reasons, principally those of poverty and the restrictive nature of education and training opportunities. It is felt that women's access to all types of information, particularly industrial data, is severely constrained and that their awareness of their potential is limited. Recommendations are therefore made for international programmes geared toward the full integration of women in development. International and bilateral agencies in offering training programmes should work closely with governments to ensure involvement on the part of women. An even greater level of involvement could be achieved if planners and administrators were cognizant of the existence of both the formal and vernacular languages. Presents specific types of women and families in the development processes of the region. Special attention is given to aspects concerning the family, education and employment, which have been given priority in the various mandates of the General Assembly and which are major fields for the social action of women. Finally, some guidelines are presented for establishing priorities, strategies and policy measures that might help improve the situation of women. The purpose of this publication is to enhance the discussion of the question of the integration of women into development in order to facilitate the formulation of working hypotheses, frame the analysis in the broader context of development and, ultimately provide tools for effectively improving the living conditions of Latin American women and their families, particularly those of the lower income groups.

In international trade the way has been set for co-ordination of activities by the appointment of an advisor to the CARICOM/ITC Trade Information System In the activity on integration of women in development, areas of focus include, assistance to women's desks, Caribbean legislation on women, and collaboration and co-ordination among organizations with women's programmes. Projections for 1981-82 as regards the Caribbean Information System include the continuation of the publication of CARISPLAN Abstracts, and follow-up of networking efforts in agriculture and science and technology. On the subject of removal of language barriers, regarded as a very important project, it is suggested that the Committee may wish to pursue the matter through the Government Ministers responsible for Unesco affairs and through an appeal to the regional ECLA as well as the UN General Assembly. Among the issues presented is the need for women to take a more active part in the job creation process. To achieve this end, it is proposed that public awareness programmes emphasize the opportunities for women to become actively involved in industrialization. The document concludes with excerpts from a study on regional industrial programming in CARICOM countries.

- * In view of the general situation of the region, it is suggested that a satisfactory strategy should: give priority to the poor rural and urban sectors; be a part of the global national or regional development programmes and strategies; be based on an integrated and multisectoral approach; take into account the role of the family in the daily and generational reproduction of individuals and the role of women, as specified for the different class situations. Other approaches are outlined, among which is one that attempts to detail a minimum group of activities. These include: 1) the provision of stable employment, with an adequate minimum income and a place of work close to the family unit for the head of the household; 2) programmes of health, housing, education and basic infrastructure services aimed at lightening the burden of domestic work and allowing women to take up other activities; 3) programmes to organize families in neighbourhood or community associations; 4) adoption of legislative measures to support objectives.

National policy statement on women: Jamaica. S.l.: s.n., 1987. 5 p. General

----> CDC VF

- * The Government of Jamaica recognizes the importance of women's participation in sustaining progress in economic, social, political and cultural development. Despite historical, traditional and cultural evidence revealing their value in society, women face many constraints to full participation in the development process, remaining undervalued and undersupported in the family and the workplace. Government recognizes that its policies must reflect a full recognition of the equal and complementary partnership of women and men. Government ministries and agencies will develop policies and programmes 1) to implement immediate goals such as ensuring that economic, trade and employment policies protect and increase women's access to employment and income to address the high level of unemployment among women; 2) to improve the pay and conditions of women's work; and 3) to promote the diversification of women's employment opportunities given that women predominate in areas of employment which receive low remuneration and have poor working conditions. An inter-ministry committee representative of key ministries will be established, responsible in general for pursuing the implementation of the Policy Statement. The Bureau of Women's Affairs will serve as facilitator and co-ordinator of the committee and as a catalyst and support to all ministries in the implementation of the Policy Statement.

* Using the Rose Hall project as a model, the paper attempts to demonstrate the effectiveness of pilot projects, as a potential instrument for influencing policy makers and national development planners. This particular project identified factors which prohibited the full participation of rural women in the development process. It had the effect of creating strong links between people at the community level and groups/agencies/organi at the local, national, regional and international levels. Lessons learnt from the implementation of the Pilot Project in Rose Hall are being used and incorporated into development projects within the region and beyond.

Plan of action for women in the CARICOM region; draft / CARICOM. Georgetown: CARICOM, 1985. 9 p.

Seminar on the Integration of Women in Development in the Caribbean, Kingston, 6-10 June 1977. General

----> CDC 7203

* The action plan makes distinction between social and economic aspects of the process of women's integration in Caribbean development. Proposals for economic integration call for an increase in job-training programmes; access to a wider range of occupations; full incorporation of women into the labour force and, given the agricultural base of most Caribbean economies, the upgrading of women's skills in agriculture as well as support for programmes to increase women's participation in agricultural projects. Hindrances to social integration identified as gender biases in schools curricula, media stereotyping - women's disproportionate responsibility for care and upbringing of children; ignorance on human reproduction, adolescent pregnancy, and inadequate health services. The plan also highlights the need for research and data collection, restructuring of education and training programmes, removal of legal disabilities, improvements in health, housing and other social services and the use of mass media for general public awareness. Also recommends the adoption of policies for women's political participation, the strengthening of institutional machinery and joint regional approaches.

Promoting and accelerating women's participation in development programmes in the Caribbean through technical cooperation among developing countries / Peggy Antrobus; UN. High-level Committee on the Review of Technical Cooperation among Developing Countries. S.I., 1981. 30 p. (TCDC/2/13)

High-level Committee on the Review of Technical Co-operation among Developing Countries, New York, NY, 1-8 June 1981. General

* Caribbean experiences and a review of issues of TCDC relating to women in development are outlined. Issues are that in spite of great social and economic participation, women tend to be low-paid and low-skilled, they are employed in traditional occupations, and have limited scope even in access to resources and services. The level of their participation indicates underdevelopment. The work of WAND is noted in the planning of programmes, and it is felt that these should be incorporated into larger programmes which could provide access to more substantial resources, avoid isolation from "mainstream" programmes and sensitize programme managers and agencies to women's concerns and strengths. Conclusions include, that any agency wishing to promote women's participation in development programmes through TCDC will have to devise new strategies which will take account of the conceptual, structural and administrative problems inherent in the "women's component" in over-all development programmes. The effectiveness of strategies for change depends on the extent to which they maintain contact with women at every level of the society, their accessibility to these women and their responsiveness to the values and programmes women define for themselves. A major recommendation is that governments of developing countries and UN organizations should work through women's professional organizational networks, in the identification and implementation of TCDC programmes for women.

Summary of the strategy paper: strategies for enhancing women's participation in water supply and sanitation activities. S.l.: Steering Committee for Cooperative Actions, 1982. 2 p.

* The objective of this paper was to emphasize the importance of women's involvement in water supply and sanitation projects and to underline the various tasks required to achieve the UN Decade for Women objectives with a view to enhancing the effectiveness of these activities through the integration of women's participation. Experience has shown that women, as primary users and managers of water resources and as the principal influence on family sanitary habits, can contribute a great deal to the better planning, functioning and utilization of the improved facilities when provided appropriate training and support. The question therefore is how best to approach, train and support women for these levels of involvement in the project cycle at the community level.

* Examines matters related to population structure, legal protection, employment, income distribution, education, health and social services. Attributes obstacles pertaining to women's full participation in the development process to the level of social and economic development in the society and to the historical and cultural factors which determine traditions, customs, beliefs and attitudes. Notes that while, theoretically, equal opportunity for women exists in education and there is no overt gender discrimination, factors of socialization appear to determine occupational choice. Direct government-initiated programmes for women are included. Other support services are provided by non-governmental organizations. An action plan is identified to sensitize the population on issues affecting the integration of women, remove discriminatory provisions in law, review curricula to encourage wider participation in non-traditional areas, to improve health and social services, to cultivate among men a more healthy attitude towards women as equal partners in home-making and as breadwinners.

Women and planning: the need for an alternative analysis / Peggy Antrobus. Cave Hill: UWI. Women and Development Studies Project (Cave Hill, BB), 1989.

Women and Development Studies. Disciplinary Seminar, 2 - Social Sciences: Women, Development Policy and the Management of Change, St. Michael, 3-7 April, 1989. General -----> CDC 9558

- * Paper admits to a reversal of a position taken earlier which viewed structural adjustment policies as failing to take women into account. Argues instead that further analysis indicates a gender ideology which assigns certain roles and characteristics to women. Far from not taking women into account the policies are described as being grounded in a set of assumptions about the roles into which most women have been socialized. Given this background, a call is issued for a re-assessment not only of conventional approaches to women and planning, but also for a questioning of assumptions fundamental to prevailing women in development studies. Proposals for an alternative analysis of women in development are presented on the basis of an acknowledged failure of approaches which placed emphasis on the "how" of incorporating gender into planning processes. The new approaches favoured by the author pose a different set of questions: Who does it?; In what socio-economic and political context?; Within what framework of assumptions and values? Paper suggests an alternative analysis grounded in feminist theory, which would embrace theories of development and social change; relate experience at the micro-level of sector, community, project or household to that of macro-economic analysis, addressing at the same time issues of both human agency and structure; a recognition of concepts of development and under-development as being related more to imbalances of power than to the presence or absence of resources; a holistic approach to economic analysis and the incorporation of the feminist principle in all aspects of development planning with progress measured by use of other checklists and other evaluation mechanisms. Recommends a redefinition of development and the adoption of approaches which link technical skills with processes which take into account political and cultural sensitivities, as well as feminist action for connecting women's experiences at the level of their communities to the processes of sectoral and national planning.

- * Study of issues related to the integration of women in development, advocating the need for gender sensitivity in development planning. While recognizing progress made in the cognitive and analytical dimensions of the woman question. paper argues for action that translates the intellectual appreciation of the situation into viable policy initiatives, which reflect the day-to-day concerns of women. Anderson analysis is quoted in support of the author's arguments: "Without the gender variable, the development equation is undermined". Case studies and observations of World Bank policy, a settlements programme in Trinidad -Sou Sou Lands and a CARICOM training programme for women are presented to underscore the shortcomings in present approaches to policy planning and implementation. Recommends complementary social analysis and social impact analysis data in the process of project development; the use of the "gender lens" as a technical tool of gender based policy planning, analysis and evaluation; and the establishing of appropriate relationships between the efficiency/effective considerations of the technicians and the imperative of developing strategies that are culturally relevant and politically responsive to the various constituencies of interest, such as women.

* The study begins with a description of the status of women in St. Vincent, including their legal status and their place in the population structure. This is followed by an examination of the extent of participation by women in the labour force, particularly in the agriculture and export sectors.

Education and health care services and certain social welfare programmes financed from the resources of the national budget, are assessed to see how far they meet the needs of the female population. The long-term objective of the study is to provide hard data for use in a regional programme aimed at involving women in the social planning process and providing basic information on women as beneficiaries of Government social services.

* The status of women in Dominica was examined and it was found that with regard to their legal status their interests were largely taken into consideration. The 1981 census was analyzed to determine: 1) the structure of the population; 2) union status of female population and births; 3) educational attainment of female population. Studies on female participation in the labour force revealed that women still concentrated in traditional female occupations; played a significant role in the agricultural sector; were employed in labour-intensive activities in the manufacturing sector. Problems women encountered in the labour market included low wages, unemployment and subtle discrimination. The census showed disparities in distribution of income between males and females. The following service sectors: education, health, welfare, youth development, economic and commercial, services in the exclusive interests of women, were investigated. The allocation of the budget in education and health services was examined. Briefly discusses the benefits of having well-educated women and women having proper access to health facilities and health education. Activities and functions of the Women's Bureau are discussed.

* Presented in four parts, this study is conducted in the field of women and development planning; the study includes two background sections on the legal rights of Jamaican women and the structure of the Jamaican population. The objectives are: to document, monitor and report on the degree of equity in the distribution of the government funded services between the sexes; and to provide hard data aimed at: integrating women in the social planning process, establishing a data base on women. From the data collected, summarizes that although females theoretically have equal rights as men to education, in reality they are disadvantaged in certain aspects of the education process. With regard to health services, women are the majority of recipients as well as providers of health services and they are the principal beneficiaries of special services that benefit women e.g. family planning, maternal and child health. With regard to employment, the issue of female unemployment, under-representation in the employed labour force and wage levels are given special focus. Among the conclusions is that there is a need to adjust imbalances of a system which still denies females an equal share of employment in the labour force, and which limits their educational and career choices to traditionally female vocations which generally represent the lower-paying income earning jobs.

* Prefaced by a description of the status of women in the country, including the legal status and place in the population structure, the study examines the extent of participation by women in the labour force, civil service and their economic status. Findings show that although traditionally women have participated actively in the social, cultural, political and economic life of the society, no explicit attempts have been made in development planning to provide reliable information on the need and potential contribution of women, over and above their domestic and nurturing roles. A detailed summary is provided of women as recipients of services (health, education, welfare) from budgetary resources.

* Attempts to show the extent to which the Government of Trinidad and Tobago, through its policies and expenditures as contained in the National Budget, has explicitly or implicitly delivered specific services and incomes to the female population in the country. Focuses on key areas in the national economy which have been identified and accepted as playing important roles in expanding the horizons of women, viz: health, education and training and welfare services. Using quantitative data as far as possible, the goal firstly, is to identify those areas which are sensitive enough to be used as indicators to assess the status of women as recipients of services within the national economy, and secondly, to use this information to prepare a methodological framework for use in other Caribbean territories. An overview of the status of women in Trinidad and Tobago indicates that women enjoy a great deal of equality in social and economic matters and in law. However, certain cultural and other social factors including the low incidence of economic independence among women place many in an unequal relationship with their male counterparts.

* In reviewing the experience of Women in Development programmes in the English-speaking Caribbean during the UN Decade for Women (1975-1985), the paper notes that in general, the programmes accepted existing socio-economic structures, failing to recognize how much these structures perpetuated and reinforced women's organization and domestication within society. As women worked on programmes to achieve the goals of the Decade, the complexity of the goals and the limitations of conventional development strategies became apparent. This led to a search in 1985 for alternative holistic models of development; the linking of gender inequality to that of race, class, and a country's position in the global economy; and an increasing feminist approach to these issues. In devising alternative development strategies, Caribbean governments would do well to apply the insights provided by the Decade to the wider society.

* The chapter reveals varying levels of political consciousness in the islands, although all women suffer from the oppressive nature of racial, sexual and economic exploitation. They are unaware of the insidiousness of neocolonialism. The paper deals with the abject misery of the desperately poor woman, the injustices endured by her working-class sister and the attitudes of the astute and cooperative self- employed women, whose prototype is the Jamaican higgler. Two basic and critical facts emerge, viz, that the extent and characteristics of women's oppression and exploitation are a direct consequence of economic status and that women's role is critical in any potential liberation struggle.

* PRODEME, a programme for development of micro-enterprises in the Dominican Republic, stated as its objectives the need to increase income among the poor, create new jobs and strengthen precarious jobs. An evaluation conducted during the course of the project indicated that PRODEME was successful in reaching entrepreneurs among poor urban dwellers, that is, until a gender-based review was undertaken. A new picture later emerged. Although women constituted a large percentage of the poor, their status was not accurately reflected either in official statistics as an indicator of their needs nor by their inclusion in the PRODEME Data are reproduced to show percentages of households in which women are the primary source of income (21 per cent among urban slum dwellers; 52 per cent among women factory workers) as well as the contribution made by women to male-headed households. The project review conducted against this background revealed evidence of disparities between men and women in the allocation of project resources. Eighty per cent of the owners and 89 per cent of employees in the micro-enterprises project were male and 62 per cent of women employed earned less than the minimum wage, compared to 5 per cent of the male employees. The review resulted in a proposal to reformulate the scope of the project for greater involvement of women.

• The paper defines the ultimate goals of economic development in the Caribbean as (1) the absence of poverty, of chronic unemployment and of demeaning job activities (2) the dominance of internal decision-making over the level and pattern of economic activity (3) equitability in the distribution of income. Aspects of a development strategy for the Caribbean are outlined and include emphasis on agriculture and agro-based industries, labour-intensive manufacturing industries, and promotion of efficient methods of small-scale production. The role of women is defined in the framework of the human element needed to implement this strategy. Their special contribution relates to the position of women in the running of the household, the predominance of women in culinary activity, and the subtle influence which women exert on all aspects of male endeavour.

* Presents six case studies of poor Barbadian women ranging in age from 27-59 years and their strategies for survival which come from four major sources of support: (1) the family home, (2) own earnings, (3) male partner and (4) Lack of education and training, a older children. preoccupation with motherhood; insufficient child care facilities and attitudes of male partners are the major factors which are identified as barriers to the acquisition of gainful and steady employment. The author concludes that the livelihood of these women illustrates a cultural duality which incorporates (1) the African and (2) the Anglo-Protestant life styles. The study contradicts the notion that women are confined to the domestic domain and cannot articulate their perceptions, values and problems and devise strategies for their survival. Notwithstanding this, the women acknowledge a socio-economic context which they have little power to change thus rendering them vulnerable.

* Examines the economic activities and linkages of the informal sector, suggests a policy framework and recommends appropriate actions to improve the situation. The sector consists of rural workers who, being displaced by technology, migrated to urban centres. Describes the composition of the sector - the poor, women, illiterate, with low capital/labour ratios, low incomes, obsolescent capital goods, operating on the fringes of the formal sector and unable to benefit from industrial incentives. There are some 122,000 persons in this group. Has little data on how many participate in industrial activities, but lists some areas where members operate e.g. food, footwear, furniture, construction, domestic service. Some ad hoc case studies were relied on for data. Strong linkages exist between both sectors in the Kingston Metropolitan Area (KMA), especially in service industries, clothing and footwear. Suggests that policy makers aim at reducing the informal sector by upgrading rural conditions; increase employment in the formal sector and narrow the gap between incomes in the two sectors; improve the lot of those at subsistence level; decentralize economic activity of KMA viv-a-vis other urban Includes in appendices detailed analysis of the prospects of some selected activities and the case studies which form the basis of the discussion.

Sees the situation arising form the state of the country's economy in the 1970s. Illustrates the supportive relationships in the informal sector with instances of higglering, pilfering, the assignment of household chores, sharing of resources with other urban and rural relatives. Concludes that the Jamaican economic situation demonstrates the ill effects of basing development programmes on foreign investment.

- * Surveys Trinidadian women about the economic situation of the country. Due to the economic recession and the devaluation of the Trinidad dollar. Trinidadian women face the challenge of buying less goods for more money. These women are more concerned with the social implications of the situation, rather than the actual severity of the situation. They believe social unrest to be a real possibility due to rising unemployment and companies going into receivership. In order to receive additional income, and to cope with the recession, Trinidadian women employ tactics such as home gardening or producing items that could be easily marketed. They also practice grocery budgeting, buying only necessary goods when cash is low, postponing convenience items until there was more money available. Through networking, the best prices for the best goods were obtained by the women. Despite high prices, product performance is an important criterion to Trinidadian women. There is some experimentation amongst various brands, but depending on the importance of a particular item, performance usually wins over price. Customer service is very important to these women who are not hesitant to voice dissatisfaction over a product. However no one store in particular receives loyal patronage, the women seeking stores that have their favourite brands available at competitive prices. Despite television advertising's potential influence, the decision to buy was based on the availability at the retailer and pricing communicated through

In: Nash, June, ed.; Fernandez-Kelly, Maria P., ed. Women, men and the international division of labour. Albany, NY: State University of New York Press, 1983. pp. 138-160 (SUNY Series in the Anthropology of Work). General

* The article examines some of the specific effects, which the I.M.F. programme of stringent fiscal controls, had on the productive and reproductive activities of working-class women in Jamaica. It focuses on the social, cultural and economic responses of urban female industrial workers and their households to the programme and notes its effects on the manufacturing sector in Kingston. Findings point to the fact that capitalist development in Jamaica created the necessary conditions for greater female membership in the working-class by providing employment in the manufacturing sector. Female working-class consciousness was underscored by the high rate of female labour force participation in the society, and a traditional ideology that acknowledged the importance of women as economic providers for their households. Job security, however, was diminished by international financial and political events. In one case, the departure of a once booming export-oriented garment industry left thousands of women jobless. Women made adjustments in the productive and reproductive functions of their households, cognizant of Jamaica's position in the global market and its effects on their own lives.

* The past 35 years have seen an evolution in concepts, models and strategies of development in the Caribbean. Three concepts of development are discussed: development as economic growth, development as growth and structural change and development as a multi-faceted process. The Lewis dual economy model of "economic development with unlimited supplies of labour" and the centre-periphery model of development/underdevelopment are considered. Finally, development strategies pursued in the region are addressed. These are industrialization by invitation, statist development and structural adjustment export-led development. Concludes that the injection of the gender dimension into discussion on development will serve to enrich the understanding of the problematic of development.

Projects for women in the Third World: explaining their misbehaviour / Mayra Buvinic

In: World Development, vol. 14, n. 5, 1986. pp. 653-664. General

----> CDC Serial

* The International Center for Research on Women (ICRW) addresses the phenomenon of the preference for and the prevalence of welfare projects for poor women in the Third World and explains the contradiction between welfare-oriented economic-based intentions and implementation. The aim of projects directed towards low-income women of the Third World since 1975 is to increase women's economic participation in development. However, most government programmes continue to concentrate on the promotion of traditionally feminine, sex-segregated, low-productivity activities for women. While policy and project objectives and women's needs all call for increasing women's productivity and incomes, social and welfare tasks prevail in projects for poor women throughout the Third World. Three related explanations suggest that firstly social rather than economic projects are encouraged. Such projects are small-scale, situation-specific, use limited funds and resources, are implemented by women and benefit only women. Secondly the institutions have expertise in the welfare sector and thus concentrate efforts in this area. Thirdly welfare projects require fewer funds and so receive more attention. Central to solutions proposed is education. The report stresses that women-only institutions should be replaced by integrated development institutions. Women-based and integrated agencies would complement each other. This development rests on the willingness of national and international development agencies to commit significant financial resources in support of economic-based policies and programmes.

Situation of Women in the Caribbean: an overview including the impact of structural adjustment policies on women / Peggy Antrobus. Santo Domingo: INSTRAW, 1988. 25 p.

Training Programme on Women in Development, 28 November - 2 December 1988.

----> CDC 9270

* Identifies the social, political and economic consequences of structural adjustment policies on women and argues for official recognition of the relationship between women's productive and reproductive roles in policy formulation. Analysis is specific to the English-speaking Caribbean where 35 per cent - 45 per cent of households are headed by women and where, by tradition, women place high value on child-bearing and mothering. It is pointed out further that whether or not women head households their economic responsibility for children, when combined with high levels of fertility and, in many instances, their responsibility for supporting extended 'domestic networks', places them in the poorest group in society. In this context, the author notes the impact on women of devaluations, cuts in subsidies and social services, the removal of price controls, the emphasis on export-oriented production in export processing zones along with other economic measures characteristic of structural adjustment programmes as well as the issues of foreign debt repayments and extra regional pressures to earn foreign exchange. The Jamaican experience is illustrated and questions raised about effects of these policies on women in the labour force where evidence has been accumulated with respect to exploration, job insecurity, and the movement of women away from more indigenous manufacturing and agriculture sectors which provide more opportunities for employment of women than do the more highly capitalized, high technology operations of the export-oriented foreign-owned industries. Calls for a re-focusing of the development effort taking into account the essential links between women's productive and reproductive roles and the inadequacies and contradictions inherent in policies which seek to promote growth at the expense of meeting basic needs as well as for official recognition of women's productive roles in the calculation of Gross Domestic Product.

Situation of women, children and youth in marginal sections of the Kingston Metropolitan Area / Omar Davies. Kingston: 1981. 93 p. General

----> JMNPA

* Investigates social agencies operating in the Kingston Metropolitan Area (KMA) from which marginal groups may benefit. Uses 1970 census data and other works to define KMA and identify "most marginal" sections. Looks at some characteristics of KMA socio-economic unemployment and housing and shows that most residents are poor and lack basic services. Residents of the marginal sections have sub-standard facilities and exist at levels below national or parish average. Considers in detail government and non-government provision of services for women, children and youth through children services and youth programmes, educational and vocational services; special services for the disabled; maternal and child health and nutrition; general services and community-based organizations. Finds them mostly inefficient and limited by budgetary constraints and shortage of staff. Examines eight such organizations which satisfy the criteria of stability and flexibility of organizational structure and proven track record. Finds them capable and willing to participate in any development programme for the areas they serve. Recommends for UNICEF involvement, labour-intensive income generating activities with a training component, designed initially for women and youth. Explains information gaps to be closed if upgrading is to be implemented and identifies eight other areas to be more fully investigated.

----> CDC UN

* Some important aspects of poor women in Latin America are covered in the six types outlined; also addressed are the variations between their living situations. methodological problems are seen to emerge 1) the difficulty of studying women apart from their family unit, 2) the shortage of relevant information which would permit a deeper analysis of each type. Among generic features common to all the types, however, are, the lack of power and social organization of women, the discrimination to which they are subjected, and the difficulties in incorporating them into types of work of higher productivity, which is linked to their poor qualifications and the low incomes that they can attain. It is seen as essential, then, to define the field better and to design more suitable techniques for studying it more scientifically. As long as poor women continue to be an unmeasurable entity, it is felt that the possibilities of concrete action by them to improve their situation will be distanced, further increasing the gap separating them both from other women and from men belonging to other social classes.

* Theories of women and development unlike traditional neo-classical and Marxist theories of development, begin and end with a feminist perspective. The paper discusses theoretical differences within some feminist development models, focusing on the work of four scholars: Esther Boserup's landmark study, Woman's Role in Economic Development; and the feminist Marxist critique of the study by Lourdes Beneria and Gita Sen; Beneria's analysis of the definition and measurement of women's activities (paid and domestic labour); and Helen Safa's examination of women's industrial work and critique of export processing plants. Of relevance to the Caribbean is Beneria's concept of 'making a living' instead of 'earning a living' to describe the ways in which women make do': and the incorporation of domestic activities in compiling indicators of women's labour.

* Voluntary Fund projects conclude that women do participate in the development process but under unequal conditions. Traditional duties and attitudes continue to deter equality. Women are often the most effective initiators of development. Thus, the Fund, because of its interfacing role between women and development, is a guardian for effective transition from subsistence activities to more sophisticated activities. Projects in the employment category include both small-scale industry and income-generating group activities among which are garment factories, pottery production, animal husbandry and handicrafts production. Concern for the environment and energy sector was assisted through seminars and workshops. A revolving loan fund became central to fund projects enabling access to credit and providing a forum for credit education. Projects proved more effective if local and national women's organizations and agencies existed. Clearly cultural and political environments, plus external monetary factors have to be taken into account since the "social sector", traditionally comprised of poor women, is most severely affected by monetary fluctuations. Analysis of projects by region and special sectors, is supported by tables illustrating the action of the Fund. Still under study is the question that women entrepreneurs in one country proved to have greater potential than men for creating additional work-places. Future operational features include providing further direct technical co-operation assistance. Special initiatives and more co-operation are geared for projects. Further assistance will be provided by such groups as the UNDP.

* Analyses the situation of women in Latin America and the Caribbean during the 1970's, contrasting the priorities of Western feminist movements (equal pay for equal work and sexual and psychological autonomy), with those of Third World women (the right to adequate employment and to primary services). Considers that the 70's witnessed the development of political underdevelopment in countries which had had strong constitutional regimes and also economic and social development, but that this was dependent capitalist development in many cases which brought an added burden of poverty and subordination to women in low-income households. Suggests that new experiences will change former priorities during the 1980's in both the Third World and the West. Highlights recent events in the Third World which have changed women's strategies for equality and development, in particular the failure of national independence or socialism to automatically improve the position of women. Concludes that strategies for the advancement of women need to give different groups of women different opportunities and that self-reliance must not lead to autarchy.

* Over sixty per cent of the major undertakings in the Caribbean, in both the private and public sector are externally funded. The reports submitted at the end of these projects indicate to those who are interested how closely the objectives initially determined have been met and will often influence whether or not further support is forthcoming. Women in the Caribbean are involved in projects at all levels; although they may not carry the title of Project Manager, they have performed that role for many years within their homes. This involved the management of time and money. The techniques of project management must be adhered to and results fully documented so that they can be held accountable and improve their internal control. The basic principles of project management are the same whether one deals with commercial ventures or not-for-profit projects. The social implications of emotional stress and bad will that are created by the lack of accountability in both types of situations cannot be over-emphasized. Through this paper, the author highlights techniques of project management in a non-technical manner. Some methods of accounting to financiers, sponsors and interested parties will also be presented.

Accumulation and gender relations in the flower industry in Colombia / Sonia M. Cuales. Connecticut: JAI Press, 1982. pp. 109-159 vol. 5, General

----> CDC 5508

* The article seeks to detect how gender relations are reproduced both in the labour market and in the labour process in the case of the flower industry in the Sabana of Bogota. An analysis is made of how the exchange and use of labour power in this sector of production is largely conditioned by the female nature of the labour capacity. Describes the general characteristics of the Sabana area, including family structure and analyses the social historical context in which the flower industry emerged in Colombia. The main part of the article presents data on the volume and value of annual exports of flowers; area and employment per flower variety; employment industry; the civil status, composition of the household unit, education, reasons for incorporation, income, additional resources, age and employment term of florist workers. Describes the labour process operations on the flower farms, focusing on activities performed, social relations in the labour process and gender criteria. Concludes that the data presented suggest that gender relations of domination are reproduced in the labour market and in the labour process.

- * Within the context of a changing social and economic environment, the paper describes changes in the degree and nature of female participation in the labour force. More specifically, the employment and family formation experiences of women between 25-29 and 35-39 in 1978 are examined. The paper also presents an analysis of the interrelations of female labour force participation, marriage and fertility for each age group. One finding that deserves some attention is the clear indication that post-marital employment is negatively related to marital disruption. Moreover, female labour expansion has a strong negative effect on fertility. It must be noted that these findings, though relevant to Santo Domingo, are not necessarily conclusive for rural areas and small towns in the rest of the country.

- * Focuses on women and rural capitalist development. Studies rural women's participation in the following contexts: the domestic unit, the community, the agrarian capitalist enterprise and the nation's economy. A brief synopsis of prior research reports is given and the social relations of production as related to historical change are outlined. Women are analyzed in terms of their double determination: the social inequalities in a class system and their subordinated position in the sexual division of labour. They function as a cheap labour force, reserve labour, and as an agent that lowers the reproduction costs of the labour force. The research here focuses on the role of women in reproduction, i.e. generational reproduction, a social reproduction and a reproduction of the labour force. Objectives are basically to question the traditional views regarding women's contribution to productive work and income generation; to analyze the sexual division of labour and its consequences for the strategies of reproduction of the domestic units; to analyze the degrees of capitalist development and their relation to the levels of female proletarianization and functioning of the agrarian labour market; to explore the relation between the magnitude and intensity of women's reproductive work and the corresponding impact on female participation in economic, social and political activities; finally to analyze the power relations between the sexes. Both the case studies and the National Survey on Rural Women are used. Evaluation guidelines cover agrarian structure, social differentiation and strategies of reproduction; women's economic participation and the occupational structure; the sexual division of labour; and the non-economic mechanisms of subordination. Concludes that the present research has succeeded in bringing to the fore a comprehensive discussion on the real contribution of women to the material reproduction of rural households in the Dominican Republic. Among the recommendations made is that the present feminist debate be included in the assumed hypothesis and the formulization of statistical procedures and calculation models be completed.

In: Race and Class, vol. 19, n. 4, 1978. p. 18. General ----> CDC 1393

* Women make up 40% of the Cuban population. Assuming that the task ahead is the full integration of women into the revolutionary effort to create the material and social foundations of communism, the paper examines changes that have taken place in women's participation in the labour force since the revolution. Women's education and employment in pre-revolutionary and revolutionary Cuba are compared: while the goals of education have been largely successful, women's participation in the labour force has not been without contradictions. Biological determinism continues to underlie the reasoning which justifies the reinforcement of a sexual division of labour and women's domestic obligations -the "second shift"- which are responsible for the high drop-out rate of women workers and the under-representation of women in the leadership ranks. The contradictions undermining the collectivization of household tasks in the public sector and the recent national campaign against sexism are discussed and it is concluded that the degree to which these are resolved will be the measure of Cuba's success in achieving a truly liberated

* Assesses the investment of multinational enterprises in Asian export processing zones, its impact on unemployment, the type of employment generated and the number of jobs created. Focuses on the experience of developed Asian countries, Malaysia, Singapore, the Philippines and Sri Lanka. Study reveals 20 per cent per annum increase in exports of manufactures in two decades, from the 60's, with developing Asia commanding a market share of 75 per cent of all exports of manufactures by developing countries. Comparisons with newly industrialized Asian economies, Hong Kong and South Korea, show, in developing Asia, a significant high contribution to the total volume of exports by multinational enterprises. Attributes EPZ-type investment policy directions to world-wide restructuring of industry, and global strategies of multinationals. Study notes that, while multinationals benefit from access to a cheap and sometimes educated workforce, EPZ production demands low skill and low capital levels and manufacturing activity is mainly in the areas of garments and electronic assembly production, with no apparent mechanism for technology transfer from the industrialized countries. Author observes that zone employment has no "substantial effect on unemployment in the region". Further analysis of the employment factor revealed a tendency towards short-term employment and income for a new and rotating segment of workers, i.e. young, female workers without work experience and with few other employment opportunities. Admits to inconclusive analysis on the question of conditions of work and labour relations. Offers no perspective on possibilities for alternative development options.

* Brief historical background of women in employment in the Caribbean during the time of slavery. Places female activity in the Caribbean in global perspective, but admits to the fact that official statistics are misleading, because of unrecorded data for women who do their own housekeeping.

Examines the low status of women in employment as compared to the status of males, the types of employment normally associated with women and the higher rate of employment among women than among men. Analyses the causes for the imbalance, these being discriminatory attitudes, customs, institutional practices and legislation, along with the stereotyping of jobs, and the feeling by women that they are emotionally, physically and intellectually inferior to men. Suggests that it is the Caribbean women who should work towards changing these attitudes and removing the obstacles. Recognizes the role that institutions, agencies and organizations as well as governments can play in changing this state of affairs. Outlines the aims of the Women and Development Unit.

- A 1982 study of 133 assembly line workers in Antigua and Barbados confirms that women are over-represented in export processing industries in the Caribbean. Interviews with managers, personnel officers and production engineers reveal that stereotypical perceptions of female biological and psychological traits account for this over-representation. Contrary to the male perception that a woman's wage supplements that of a man or provides the frills for the household, the study shows that the majority of women engaged in export processing jobs are working out of economic necessity.

- * Discusses fertility levels of women as a variable in their environment in the labour force. Selects three associated variables for consideration: age, union/marital status and place The data used is taken from the 1970 of residence. Population Census of Jamaica. Of specific relevance to this paper is the participation of women in family building activities in exchange for or in conjunction with work outside the home. Finds that Jamaican women display a relatively high level of economic involvement along with high levels of family building activities. Supports the hypothesis that there exists an inverse relationship between employment and fertility. The three indices of fertility used indicate consistently lower fertility levels for working women. Indications are that married women have the lowest participation rates and the highest levels of fertility. Notes the high level of participation for women who have disrupted unions. Points out that regional variation in female labour force participation further suggests the influence of several factors.

Argues that only a strong militant and united working class organization can effectively represent women in Trinidad and Tobago. Attacks the established trade union movement for its undemocratic policies, penchant for compromise, neglect of working class education and ultimate suppression of the class struggle and discusses inadequacies at the work place which militate against workers rights - the absence of job classification and safety provisions. It is found that women are exposed to super-exploitation - 40% are economically active and 35% are completely unemployed as against 20% of the men. The chapter also discusses ideological oppression within the context of marriage and the family, and the exacerbated sexual oppression experienced by most women. The role of the education system in reinforcing women's inequality is also dealt with, for it adapts the female labour force to the needs of the colonialists. The chapter concludes with the observation that French West Indian women have not yet begun to deal with their particular problems, and highlights deliberate attempts to destroy the culture of the people.

* Provides an example of the marginalization of women as a result of industrialization. The advent of the Shell oil refinery (1918) and its highly mechanized techniques provided no employment for lower class women. Industrialization brought with it the end of agriculture and crafts in which women played an important role. In the seventies unemployment of women was more than 28% and in all areas the supply of female labour is many times larger than the number of jobs available. Even though social mobility for individuals and groups has increased and a growing percentage of women in the upper and middle strata is joining the labour force, the position of black lower class women has come from relative autonomy to increasing dependency.

- Gives an overview of the industrialization policies pursued by CARICOM countries and examines women's participation in the manufacturing sector. While women predominate in the textile, wearing apparel, leather and electronics industries, and constitute 50 per cent of the workforce in the food processing and paper products industries, few managerial posts are held by women. In spite of the training facilities available in all countries, women and men still cling to traditional skills. The problem of day-care centres for working mothers, and income-generating activities for unemployed women, are also discussed.

- * Paper defines informal sector as a form of economic activity undertaken by individuals who are either not absorbed in the labour market or have opted to remain outside of it. The main purpose of their activity is to gain or complement an income which is used for subsistence or improvement of living conditions. Describes women's entry into the informal sector as determined by necessity, based on a Caribbean reality of a high percentage of women having sole responsibility for their own economic well being and that of their families. Notes and illustrates by data provided, the omission of women's economic contribution in official statistics and establishes a relationship between the formal and informal sectors as they impact upon development. Recommends further study of the participation of women in the informal sector and the formulation of action programmes to address specific needs of the female population.

* Reviews development strategies pursued in the Commonwealth Caribbean since World War II and briefly considers their impact on the distribution of employment opportunities for men and women. It is generally accepted today that Commonwealth Caribbean countries will have to rely on external markets to provide much of the stimulus for their growth and development in the future. A worse state scenario of Caribbean economies in the late 20th century, based on current trends in the international economy, anticipates that they will remain export sectors passively incorporated into the international capitalist system, with essentially negative implications for employment and gender equity. An alternative strategy for structural transformation based on knowledge within the labour force, is proposed. Such a strategy, it is argued, is likely to be more gender-equitable.

New enclave industries and women workers in the Eastern Caribbean: LDC women workers in industry: research report / Cecilia Green. Kingstown: CARIPEDA; CUSO, 1988. 377 p.: tbls., illus., diag. General

* Phase I of a programme oriented research project with three major objectives: to analyze and assess the impact of export-processing enclave industries on national development and on women factory workers in the Eastern Caribbean (OECS); to conduct a needs assessment for funding for a programme to meet the special requirements of women workers; to initiate through the research process a sub-regional network for discussion, collaboration and overall support services with respect to women workers in industry as well as in other sectors of the economy. Report relies heavily on data pertaining to St.Vincent and to a lesser extent, Dominica, with relevant statistics and analyses related to St. Kitts/Nevis, Montserrat, St. Lucia, Grenada, Antigua and Barbados. Principal research components include analyses of global and local economic factors as they relate to enclave industrialization in the OECS sub-regional grouping; the history and nature of Caribbean women's labour force participation, case histories of labour disputes; observations and illustrative accounts of women's status in the trade union movement; and a summary report of workshops held in St. Emphasis placed on studies of conditions and characteristics of female dominated garment and electronics industries. Data provided on female labour force participation rates over a decade reveal modest increases in all OECS states, with the exception of Dominica where report notes a 24.6 per cent decline in 1970 in female labour force participation from 71 per cent in 1960, in addition to an overall decline in traditional and own-account female workers, not absorbed in the industrialization thrust. Other analyses and statistical data provide background information on contribution of manufacturing to GDP; literacy and educational status of women; female emigration; female headed households, birth rates and fertility, and women's health issues. Profiles the enclave industries in terms now commonly descriptive with respect to their impact on national development noting their weaknesses in providing forward and backward linkages in relation to local economies; the tendency to operate solely on the basis of self-interest with no commitment to the developing economy and the effects on the growth of local manufacturing, regional economic co-operation and multilateral relations. Conclusions point to the need to build stronger ties with the labour movement and to expand the project's agenda.

* Utilizing recent census and household survey data, this paper examines the position of women in Latin American labour markets from the following perspectives: levels of activity, employment, unemployment underemployment characteristics and occupational stratification. The norms which define women's role in society as well as local cultural economic systems are decisive in all these areas. However, the pattern of women's participation is not just a matter of sexual discrimination but is differentiated according to social class and income level. Some improvements for women have been made over the last decade but these gains have been modest and the position of women in the labour force continues to be marginal. The fate of women in the labour force is linked to the basic problems associated with the prevailing style of development in Latin America and their inability to gain full and equal participation is a function of this development pattern. The probability of meaningful change is dependent on the degree to which fundamental reforms are made in the structure of production and consumption, income distribution and the power structure. Otherwise only a small minority of women may be expected to significantly improve their labour force status as a result of expanded educational systems, economic modernization and pressure group activity.

Participation in formal and informal sectors of the economy: are women entrepreneurs? / Sonia M. Cuales. Port of Spain: s.n. 11 May 1989. 24 p.: tbls. General
----> CDC 9424

* Once a distinction is made between entrepreneurial skills and managerial skills, definitions of each area become more tenable. This paper makes such a distinction. The focus is on women's participation as entrepreneurs, with special reference to the informal sector where women engage mainly in inter-island trade in agricultural produce. The study is conducted against the background of common perceptions which allocate to a majority of Caribbean people, and women in particular, a status of entrepreneurial impoverishment. Observations are also based on a comparative analysis of women and the formal sector and, in this regard, factors which are said to inhibit participation are taken into account. These are stated as the tendency to avoid risk-taking; the home as the primary source of respectability for women; and family responsibilities. It is noted, however, that these characteristics are less pertinent to the situation of the female entrepreneur in the informal sector, and a class assessment is introduced to support this observation: that limitations to participation may be associated with the extent to which income-generating alternatives are available to women. In the informal sector, comprising in the majority women of lower social grades these inhibiting features tend to be less discernible, says the author: "A woman with little alternative choices may have to develop attitudes and mechanisms which force her to set aside respectability, family responsibilities and the hesitation to take risks." Profiles are presented to illustrate the reasons for women's entry into the informal sector, the skills and abilities they develop or harness and the economic significance of their work. The hardships they experience are also documented. Conclusions refer to the need for equity with the formal sector in provision of support systems for entrepreneurs in the informal sector, and gender inequality is seen to be central to the problems encountered by women in the sector. Recommendations indicate that solutions to problems may be found in increased gender-awareness in all aspects of education and training, changes in regulations which place constraints on women traders, trader organisation and pressure groups and the introduction of programmes and projects designed to upgrade women's trading practices.

* Findings indicate an improvement in the ratio of professional women to men during the 1970s, but this is most marked in "typically feminine" careers such as teaching. Sex role discrimination against women still seems to operate within professional circles, although attitudes have improved somewhat. It would appear, however, that professional women tend to rationalize their careers in terms of their suitability for women. Further changes in attitudes seem imperative: for men, in accepting the woman's worth as an equal, and for women, in not selecting careers only because they have been designated "woman's work".

Women and Development Studies. Disciplinary Seminar, 2 - Social Sciences: Women, Development Policy and the Management of Change, St. Michael, 3-7 April, 1989. General ----> CDC 9559

* Study of domestic service as an activity within the informal sector as well as in the context of the inherent class conflicts between employer and employee. Focuses on the nature of domestic service in terms of the work portfolio and the "work codes" that have developed. Analysis takes into account and makes distinction between domestic roles and domestic service. Observations on domestic roles are made against the background of Jamaican middle-class family structures and interrelationships, with emphasis on the emotional stakes central to the power balance between husband and wife. The function of domestic service is seen as primarily that of a resource for the wife/mother, which is utilized more to perpetuate the sexual division of labour than to allow for greater autonomy outside of the household by the employer. The organization's structure in domestic service is described as one in which the employer creates and maintains a personalized though subordinate relationship, establishing social distance in the midst of intimacy; seeking to maintain sexual neutrality while exercising dominance in the form of maternalism. Caught in this complex dichotomy of employers' expectations as against their own desire for a relationship based on respect and fairness, the women workers continue to express a wish for unionization and a more neutral form of Study also presents information on sexual harassment, work conditions and tenure and physical violence, where this was noted. Concludes that domestic service is a highly selective occupation, in which women workers show a strong tendency towards identification with their social reproductive roles and one in which the survivors in the sector are those who acquire for themselves a sense of empowerment gained through a transfer process that alters the attitudes of the employer.

* The UN Decade for Women (1975-1985) activated a wealth of research on women which recognized women's productive and reproductive roles in society and emphasized women's contribution to economic development. Three methodological concerns of research on women's work have been the definition and the measurement of women's work and the reasons why women work. The major empirical issues which have emerged in the research debate, include women's contribution to household support; role incompatibility; occupational segregation and housework. Except for some highly innovative initiatives, particular strategies to enhance women's income-earning ability, have had limited success. The role of research in addressing this problem, is outlined. Findings of the Women in the Caribbean research project, illustrate the analysis.

- * Reiterates four arguments generally put forward to justify the establishment of Export Processing Zones (EPZs): to satisfy demand for jobs in the shortest possible time; as a stimulus for entry into the international market; to capitalize on the existence of significant local resources, including energy, efficient infrastructure and educated labour; and to provide valuable linkages to the domestic economy. On the basis of empirical evidence, the paper disputes the short-term job creation factor and places emphasis on analysis of the three remaining propositions. The study puts into context two basic realities: Caribbean competitiveness in terms of satisfying investment needs and industrial restructuring of developed economies based on technical change. The highly mechanized garment industry, a feature of EPZ production, is cited as an example of the process of job elimination by high technology processes. Also noted is the effect on competitiveness of EPZ proliferation in Third World countries. Caribbean policy makers are urged to undertake independent analysis of the implications of technical change for general international competitiveness of Caribbean economies.

• Offers from an historical perspective an insight into the status of women in Trinidad and Tobago. Suggests that such a discussion begin by viewing women as objects and workers. States that East Indians were semi-slave labourers of an oppressive socio-religious culture whereas black women as slaves were subjected to special abuse as a sexual object and as a worker. Emphasizes the oppression of women as workers in a capitalist society, and as persons in a male-dominated culture and suggests that the social characteristics of women are shaped by the nature of their work in society. Suggestions made concerning the role of women are: to fight against U.S. imperialism, against unemployment and poverty, for a progressive educational system, for autonomy and freedom.

* Examines the impact of export-oriented industries (EDI) on 106 women employed in electronics production, an export-oriented industry, in St. Lucia. Discusses the demography of female workers, the status conferred by factory work, perceived work related problems, women as trade unionists and migration as an option. Concludes that EDI offers women very few transferable skills, little job security, and subsistence level incomes. Such a labour force cannot contribute to national development in the long run. Also concludes that women feel exploited. Recommends improved working conditions through Government enactment of minimum wage rates or trade union recognition legislation; enforcement of safety and health regulations; factory managers listening to workers' suggestions.

* Although nearly 23 percent of all professional staff in United Nations posts subject to geographical distribution are women, few changes have actually occurred since 1982 with regard to the improvement of the status of women in the UN Secretariat. Also, while overall statistics seem to indicate progress, they hide serious inequalities in grade level distribution, in distribution by occupation, and in geographical distribution. At the senior officer level and above, women are still very scarce, the majority being found in service-oriented functions in administration and language posts in the Secretariat. The bulk of this group comes from only two regions of the world. This indicates the need to expand and strengthen the network of recruitment sources in order to achieve a significant change in the status of women. Governments and non-governmental organizations alike can encourage women to consider international careers. Also, career development and promotion mechanisms within the UN Secretariat ought to be strengthened, so that all women will participate fully in the organizations's substantive work.

* This paper sets out to examine certain theoretical and methodological issues which emerge in the study of women and plantation labour in the Caribbean. The paper is divided into two sections. The first identifies the theoretical and methodological issues which arise from such a study, while the second section of the paper discusses the experiences of African women during the period of slavery and Indian women in the indentureship period. In both instances, the sexual and social division of labour is examined and the changes over time. This section also examines the periods of the eighteenth and early nineteenth century with regard to slavery and up to 1917 in relation to Indian indentured labour.

----> CDC 3721

* Looks at the history of slavery and re-interprets it from a woman's perspective. Reveals that girl slaves worked from four years of age: women outnumbered men in the field because of their lower mortality rates; there were no housewives among slaves; a division of labour did exist with women always being excluded from the more prestigious and skilled jobs; reproduction was not popular from either the viewpoint of the ruling classes or the slaves; female slaves were regarded as a poor investment; the nuclear family was actively discouraged by planters since it did not meet the needs of capital; polygamy and multiple associations were practiced; reforms encouraged marriage, the nuclear family, reduced female work hours, and made provisions to raise living standards. However the planter class was willing to go only so far as was economically necessary in ameliorating their treatment of the female slaves. With emancipation the daily wage was determined by sex and seniority. The female ex-slave received lower wages and did the menial jobs. Planters and managers developed a marked preference for male labourers justified by the relative unreliability of female labour. There was a trend towards increased marriages and table monogamous unions plus an increase in birth rate. Concludes that the African ex-slave women had moved into capitalist wage-labour society. Her role was reproduction, and a secondary position on the labour market. Concludes that women are capable, all things being equal, of labour similar to men in quantity and quality to that of men; that women have a higher survival rate than men; that the family as developed by capitalism has as its basis the domination of woman as the property of her husband.

- * Describes the role played by women workers in the modern industrial sector of Caribbean economies. Draws from studies conducted in various countries - including Barbados, Guyana, Jamaica, and St. Vincent - which show, among other things, that (i) changes in the production structure, e.g., mechanization, often displace women workers, forcing them into more menial jobs, or into domestic service or petty trade; (ii) jobs offered by multinational corporations in search of cheap unskilled labour often favour women, who work under poor conditions and without fringe benefits; relegation of women; to relatively unproductive work is based on persistent myths about the very real economic responsibilities of women; (iv) such practices have serious implications for economic and social development in the Caribbean region. • Contends that in Caribbean societies, women predominate in the service sectors such as domestic household help, sales, hotel service workers and higglering and also in the civil service, teaching and nursing. Analyses some of the reasons for the great imbalance in the labour force. Active discrimination and exploitation are evident in certain areas, but points out that the attitudes of women play an important contributory role. They are socialized into believing that they must be relegated to the back seat and that leadership in all spheres belongs to the domain of men. Argues that a total change in women's position especially in employment will only materialize with a new economic order - one that does not merely involve the transfer of resources from rich to poor but one which involves the total mobilization and transformation of our societies. In the meantime however, West Indian women have to be agents of that change. Proposes some short-term measures which can be pursued within the present economic and social structure to improve the position of women in employment. Includes a summary of discussions and recommendations.

- * Discusses discrimination against women in the Caribbean with respect to employment levels and job status, and gives specific examples to illustrate that differential wages and status are accorded men and women for performing the same functions. Points out that while facts may indicate that women are suppressed in economic, social and legal spheres the stated objective of official policy is to promote their development. Asserts that discrimination against women is culturally and traditionally determined and examines stereotypes of the female worker. Argues that West Indian women are in a better position than Latin American women due to changes in social attitudes and economic necessity, noting however that employers recognize that hiring women is in the interest of the organization concerned because female labour is cheap and malleable. Concludes that legislation against discrimination must be followed by action to ensure that equality of opportunity exists in practice while changes in social attitudes and social structures are the prerequisites for the meaningful improvement of women.

* Analyses the root causes of female oppression and discusses peculiarities of the exploitation of female wage labour in Trinidad. Argues that the roots of this oppression are economic and social in character and deeply intertwined with the transition from pre-class to class society. In Trinidad and Tobago, female workers are a super-exploited layer in the work force and are concentrated in the least-skilled and lowest-paid jobs. Anti-women, anti-worker laws further reinforce women's secondary status. Compares the limited gains achieved by the radicalization of women in the developed capitalist countries with the advances made by Cuban and Grenadian women through the process of revolutionary struggle, and assesses the role which progressive trade unions can play in redressing the inequality and oppression of women in Trinidad. The following proposals are put forward: the establishment of women's caucuses within trade unions with full equality; the education of all workers on the issues of women's liberation; the accordance of preferential treatment in the election of women to leadership levels; and the designation and observance of an annual women's day.

* The role of women in the Agency for Public Information is examined against the background of the history, role and functions of the public information services. The personnel policies, employment and promotion practices of the organization are considered as are the attitudes of male personnel to their female colleagues, the acceptance or non-acceptance of female employees by the wider public and the proportion of women employed and their positions within the organization. The special role of women in the media is seen as helping to eliminate and eradicate stereotyping of women's roles and sexist language in the media and to ensure that adequate and balanced coverage is given to women's issues. Concludes that the role of women in public information services is circumscribed by the policies and programmes of the government which they serve.

Women traders in Guyana / Yvonne Holder. Port of Spain: ECLAC. Subregional Headquarters for the Caribbean, 1988. 58 p.: tbls., map (LC/CAR/G.251) General -----> CDC UN

* The Guyanese women traders are projected within an age distribution of 16 to 50 years, mainly unsupported heads of households and of limited educational attainment. Study notes both negative and positive consequences of their trading activities. Success stories are recorded of women who earn high profit, have acquired new knowledge of business practices and have moved on to become active participants in the formal trading sector. For a majority, however, the study points to persistent difficulties related to a lack of training in small business management and marketing techniques; the acquisition of capital; indignities experienced in dealings with airline personnel, immigration and customs officials owing to a lack of understanding of official procedures; and the mental and physical stresses caused by the demands of the women's dual responsibilities in the home and in the world of work. Recommends the development of support systems for child care and other welfare needs, improved health and family life education, the removal of discrimination with regard to bank financing, and training for the development of women's business skills. Also advances the case for more efficient methods of capturing women's contribution to national economic effort in official statistics. Study responds to the emphasis placed in the Regional Plan of Action on the need to recognize and evaluate women's contribution to the It was conducted as a component in the ECLAC/CDCC "Women in Trade" regional project. The analysis contained in this study of women traders in Guyana is slotted into the framework of Guyana's social and economic structures, current trends as determined by government policy and historical perspectives on women's economic activity in Guyana. It's focus is on trade in the informal sector and on the social and economic consequences of women's participation. Background information reveals that increased trading activity in Guyana's informal sector coincided with the country's post-independence foreign exchange crisis and the Guyanese Government's strategy to divert demand away from imports toward domestically produced products by imposing restrictions on the importation of certain commodities. A market for trade in scarce products was opened up, first dominated by men and later attracting large numbers of women for whom trading in the informal sector offered opportunities for increased earnings, travel and self-reliance.

- * This study responds to the emphasis placed in the Regional Plan of Action on the importance of research into economic activities of women. It's stated objectives are to increase the visibility of women's contribution to trade; provide insights into sub-regional trading activities conducted by women; identify training and organizational deficiencies and to assess the social and economic impact of the informal sector and its effects on regional integration, employment creation, income distribution and standards of living. documentation on trading patterns, vendor profiles, organization and structure of the trade, as well as information on its historical development. Conclusions reveal government ambivalence towards the women traders, on the one hand restricting their activities through regulatory measures and on the other responding to pressure from traders by making concessions from time to time. Recommends continued NGO support of women in the informal sector and the strengthening of trader associations where they exist. Calls for more in-depth research on the effects of travelling on the lives of traders and comparative research on their activities and those of the more traditional traders.

Women, reproduction and foreign capital in Curacao / Sonia M. Cuales

In: Caraibisch Forum, vol. 1, n. 2, 1980. [pp.75-86] General ----> CDC 5581

* The study defines Curacao as a peripheral capitalist society, with a matrifocal type family structure. Dependence on occasional incomes forms the material basis for the women's employment at Texas Instruments, an export-oriented electronic assembly enterprise, during the period of the company's operation in the territory (8 years). The question leading the analysis is: would participation of women in industrial labour, particularly implying an important improvement of their economic position, lead towards major changes in their traditional subordinate position? Findings are measured against three major functions they traditionally performed: a) the role of procreation; b) taking care of the household in general, of the man and the children in particular; and, c) economic activity, i.e. how to provide for their own subsistence and that of their household. Results indicate that procreation decreased in the benefit of capital. that the care-taking role became heavier, and that economic activities increased. A drastic change in male domination was not evident, so that even though the material basis for women's subordination, economic dependence, had disappeared to a large extent, women remained in a subordinate position. The results are explored against three factors: 1) the relatively short nature of the experience; 2) the sophisticated human relations techniques which specifically exploit the traditionally defined attributes of feminine passivity, submissiveness, sentimentality, sexual desirability, generally applied at the plant; and, 3) the lesser possibility of the development of a feminist consciousness in a periphery society where material conditions are much less favourable than in capitalist societies.

- * The chapter reviews the present integrated approach to women and development. It attempts to show how a misunderstanding of concepts concerning women's role and status has resulted in an incorrect approach to the issue. The principal problem is that of unemployment, but it is found that development plans related to income generation and employment do not enhance women's ability to earn an income. Therefore, a new definition of integration and development is proposed and applied concretely to a case study of Barbados. The findings of the study are discussed and further illustrated by tables.

- * Researches extensively the nature of women's employment in 3 Caribbean islands, viz Antigua, St. Vincent and Barbados. It was found that women with primary education are heavily concentrated in service and agriculture in Barbados (70.9 percent) and St. Vincent (43.5 percent), and in service and production jobs in Antigua (76.2 percent). Among women with a secondary education, the major location is in the clerical jobs, which account for 53.5 percent in Antigua, 41.2 percent in St. Vincent and 32.4 percent in Barbados. For women with tertiary education, the most important jobs are professional which account for 76 percent in Antigua and over 50 percent in Barbados and St. Vincent. The overwhelming majority of these professionals are teachers and nurses, thus tertiary level education in this context applies more to vocational than university training.

- * Attempts to assess action and educational programmes for rural women in Dominica. Grenada. St. Lucia and St. Vincent. Data on the demographic characteristics of the female population; on female-headed households, and female labour force participation and educational status, are presented and rural action and education programmes are described. The paper notes that agricultural extension services are differently distributed between male and female to the detriment of female farmers, and that none of the programmes for extension workers includes home economics at the regional levels. It concludes that apart from Grenada, none of the other islands has a national policy on behalf of rural women and families. A number of recommendations for future action are made, based on the needs of the four countries. These include the need for data and documentation on the role and situation of rural women and the inclusion of specific projects for women within the framework of rural development programmes. Criteria on which the selection of programmes and mechanisms should be based are also identified.

* Compilation of papers presented at FAO Round

Table convened in St. Lucia in July 1987. Contains five chapters. The first presents historical factors which helped shape the situation of women in agriculture and rural employment in the region, through a case study on women's participation in the sugar plantations in Trinidad and Tobago. Chapter two analyzes the socio-economic situation of women under different agricultural production systems. The third chapter is concerned with the institutional framework in the Caribbean countries to promote action for women in development, with emphasis on programmes and policies related to rural women. Chapter four presents an overview of legislation affecting women in Barbados, Belize, Guyana and St. Lucia, including a focus on rural women and analysis of constitutional guarantees. A collection of five case studies is presented in the final chapter. These address problems of women's statistical invisibility in Jamaica; land tenure, production systems, employment and labour utilization in St. Lucia; the historical participation of women in agriculture and development in Belize; the mechanisms contributing to redundancy of female labour in Trinidad and Tobago's sugar industry; and analyses of the status of female agricultural workers in Antigua in five categories: labourers, small farmers, women in marketing, middle-level field technicians and professionals.

* Designs a programme for women to fit into the activities and objectives of the II Integrated Rural Development Project (IDRP). Through the Family Food Production Plan, vegetable gardening output complements starchy foods, thus providing a balanced diet with little animal protein. The plan arose from the needs of farm women who were not considered in the main (IDRP) programme. With inputs from the women, pre-planning included selecting suitable vegetables, organizing the course, training home extension officers in the community. Nutrition and health and vegetable gardening were the main topics of the course. Concludes that the project has had reasonable success. In 9 months 540 women and their families had vegetable gardens; there were 20 extension officers in the field. Considers other aspects for the future: a women's centre; a viable craft shop; a child development centre to enhance and widen the women's interests beyond nutrition towards responsible parenthood; the role of the father in childrearing and the importance of family planning.

* Although exact figures are not available, data gleaned from the 1982 Agricultural Census and from enrolment figures submitted to the Central Statistical Office by the University of the West Indies and the Eastern Caribbean Institute of Agriculture and Forestry indicate that women are represented at every level of the agricultural sector in Trinidad and Tobago - as professionals, paraprofessionals, landowners, farmers and labourers. Indications are that graduates are predominantly male; that different levels of prestige are enjoyed by women at the professional and paraprofessional levels causing lack of empathy between them; that there is discrimination and indifference on the part of male colleagues; that no specific services serve the needs of the female agricultural worker. These have implications for the progress of agriculture because the women's contribution appears significant and worthy of consideration during policy planning.

* The purposes of the study are two-fold: to ascertain the extent and nature of economic participation by women in small-scale agriculture, and to suggest policies and strategies for the most efficient delivery of agricultural support services to improve the economic well-being of these women and their families. The questionnaire method is used for the survey. The report is divided into four sections. The first analyses the agricultural sector, focussing especially on the structure of the agricultural labour force and the role of women. The purpose is to provide a background against which to evaluate and compare the empirical findings of the field survey of small-scale agriculture which forms the following two sections. The final section details recommendations and programme ideas for improving the delivery of services to women engaged in small scale agriculture. They fall under the headings, 1) national extension service personnel, 2) an integrated participatory approach, 3) delivery of agricultural information, 4) access to productive resources, 5) data base, research and evaluation, 6) action pilot project, 7) regional co-operation.

- * Data analysis and statistical break down are included. Interviews and questionnaires are used to gain information. The findings are discussed by a workshop comprising local, national, regional and international agencies involved in agricultural projects in the region with the aim of extracting issues, making recommendations, suggesting activities and implementation measures. Small groups and plenary sessions discuss issues like: 1) accessibility to credit; 2) social activities for women; 3) rising age of farmers; 4) nuclear households; 5) consumption patterns; 6) women investment patterns; 7) farm family; 8)transmission of agricultural information; 9) co-ordination of district/community level; 10) role of extension officers; 11) negative attitudes of women; 12) disposal of surplus; 13) need for more data; 14) evaluation. Four broad headings are outlined as: development strategy; the issue of lack of productivity and rural poverty; methodology and communications strategy; linking community to policy. The need to reintegrate agriculture into the education system and to encourage interested youth into production rather than to become agricultural scientists is stressed. An integrated approach strategy is recommended. Wide ranging recommendations include focus on the family farm, training in the field and formally for officers, improved agricultural technology, exploitation of communication channels for fullest benefit, that community pilot projects be established for co-ordination in other islands.

- * As its first attempt at intra-household variables in the design of appropriate technologies, CARDI conducted an Area Focused Study in the Mabouya Valley, St. Lucia. The goal was to provide information for designing, testing, documenting and evaluating improved production systems and as such close attention was placed on analy the farm household in terms of its patterns of labour allocation, decision making and resource flows. Out of 810 households a stratified sample of 19% was interviewed, 62.2% of the sample were male, 37.8% were An analysis of the results revealed that basic demographic and farm data showed no significant gender differences. Gender differences were observed in labour utilization by gender in the lower valley, where nearly all the holdings were more than 25ha, and in the area of farm management. - * Focuses on the extent to which farming policies and systems, especially the new co-operative farms, have or have not tackled gender issues in the tobacco-growing areas of San Luis in Pinar del Rio province and Cabaiguan in Sancti Spiritus. Highlights significant differences in history, land structure and organization and type of tobacco grown, all of which have had a bearing on past and present gender patterns. Overall policy is seen as successful in opening up new avenues for women. With the new co-operatives, a specific agricultural policy prescription for women was spelt out. Co-operatives are seen as providing the structure best catering to women's needs in the productive and reproductive process helping them out of a subordinate position.

* Paper seeks to unravel many myths and misconceptions about women's involvement in agriculture in Trinidad and Tobago by tracing the historical origins of discrimination against women as reflected in colonial policy during the period of slavery, post-emancipation, indentureship and post-indentureship. Several facts are established about female agricultural labour, the principal being that both men and women were brought to the region primarily for the purpose of labouring in the sugar plantations, women being assigned equal labour while it was economically beneficial to the plantation owners. Further evidence of women's participation is indicated by documentation of women's involvement in domestic production, precipitated by the economic need of the planters to reduce food costs for slaves; in the evidence found of women's ability to market surpluses from domestic production, using the income derived from this activity to purchase their freedom; in the successful marshalling of women to the wartime cause of alleviating food shortages in an official "Grow More Food" campaign. The sexual division of labour in agriculture is illustrated as being clearly related to economic policy, a noted example being the redefinition, under indentureship, of female labour in the same category as "weakly men and children" to justify lower wages, remuneration being an established feature of the system of indentureship. Authors note that the contemporary period continues to manifest those trends established and propose a greater understanding of the experience of women in agriculture in light of newly emerging trends to reconsider agriculture as an avenue for employment as well as economic viability.

The incorporation of gender into FSRE stems from the recognition of the crucial role played by women in national food security, a factor which has largely been invisible as agricultural statistics do not adequately reflect this. - * The paper, which focuses mainly on the Jamaican reality, argues that a series of interlocking events are part of larger systems generating hungry people. The case of families who have inherited, or will inherit too little land on which to survive, or declining productivity due to outmigration from the rural areas are processes which generate people who cannot find a place in the economy or society. It is among such people that malnutrition is likely to occur. Solutions proposed include the strengthening of national nutrition policy and increased emphasis on smallholder agriculture. The paper also discusses the major problems facing policymakers in choosing the proper balance among complementary agricultural policies to increase food production.

With regard to agricultural activities, she plays a major role. Even post-harvest activity is her domain, for it is the woman who sells the produce in the market. However, as a force in the community, her potential is not fully developed. It is suggested that she be suitably educated to have a different perception of her responsibilities and to appreciate her own worth. An atmosphere of confidence should be created to encourage women to talk about their problems. They should also be sensitized as to the services available to them.

* The paper briefly looks at areas in the post-harvest system where the role of women should be strengthened to ensure both the reduction of food losses and the preparation and preservation of food to promote better nutritional standards for the people of the region. The need for appropriate technologies for processing, preservation and storage, food marketing problems, extension and input needs are discussed. The conclusion reached is that any effort to drastically reduce post-harvest losses must recogni the role played by women and that they should be provided with training, extension services, credit and other necessary inputs. Evaluation of post-harvest losses programmes must not only seek to assess the success of technical innovations but also understand the effects on women and small scale farmers.

Includes research findings and brief analyses of the socio-economic status of the traders, the employment-generating capacity of inter-island trade and the political and bureaucratic hindrances which inhibit freedom of movement and income-earning capacity. Notes positive contributions made by women traders with respect to foreign exchange earnings, employment creation. development of self-supporting mechanisms, and the nutritional status of the population. Round Table on the Participation and Integration of Women in Agricultural and Rural Development in the Caribbean, Castries, 6-10 July 1987.

Technical Cooperation Programme: Participation and Integration of Women in Agricultural and Rural Development in the Caribbean (TCP/RLA/6656(C)). General

* The objectives of the meeting were to: analyze results of the studies conducted by CARDI on women in agriculture and rural development; review programmes and policies in the area and define areas of action and priorities. The meeting identified several areas in which action should be taken, involving a number of the principal agents of the process of integration of rural women into development, including governments, assistance agencies and women's organizations. Specific recommendations were made within such areas as employment and economic activities for rural women; women's participation in agricultural and rural development; strengthening the capability of women's integration into development and communications and dissemination of information. Specific areas that require priority attention either through research activities or formulation of projects were also identified. In order to improve employment and increase incomes of rural women, both as wage earners and as self-employed it is recommended that priority areas such as provision of adequate extension services and accessibility to credit for self-employed women, should be examined. Among issues to be addressed are: an in-depth analysis and evaluation of the role of women in key economic sectors of the rural and national economies; research regarding the current and potential participation of women in this sector and an evaluation of this role and contribution; training in marketing operations and development of marketing channels.

* Provides a general background to the situation of peasant women, analy the constraints - legal, socio-economic, cultural - inhibiting their full integration into the development process. Recommends major institutional changes related to legislation, national planning programmes, as well as in decentralization and local administrative programmes, and urges a reappraisal of rural development programmes. It also suggests an improvement in the terms of trade between rural and urban sectors, with emphasis on promotion of the consumption of traditional foods and use of local foods in food aid programmes.

- * This review of 13 Latin American agrarian reforms shows that most have directly benefitted only men. It is argued that this is largely because of the common designation of 'households' as the beneficiaries of an agrarian reform and the subsequent incorporation of only male household heads into the new agrarian reform structures. It is shown that a necessary, but not sufficient, condition for rural women to benefit on par with men is that they too be designated as beneficiaries. Women as well as men must be given access to land or the opportunity to participate within the agrarian cooperatives or state farms promoted by an agrarian reform. This comparative analysis demonstrates that this has happened only in countries where the incorporation of rural women to the reform is an explicit objective of state policy.

* The outstanding feature of this case study of rural women's employment, health and education in Haiti is the extent to which women contribute to the rural economy through their highly efficient marketing of the country's subsistence foodstuffs. In Haiti women have for a long time been in charge of the trade in subsistence goods, and have increasingly concentrated their productive efforts on a highly specialized system of marketing, leaving the greater part of cultivation (also highly specialized), and a fair share of childcare and household work in the hands of men and boys. A number of activities for rural women have been proposed within the framework of UNDP-supported projects underway These activities give special attention to the economic roles and needs of rural women, with particular stress on the training of women and girls, the extension of credit and loan facilities to women, and their participation in grass-roots and community-level organizations, such as co-operatives.

* Presents a brief history of agriculture in Guyana, outlining the specific goal of achieving self-sufficiency in food production. Using the questionnaire method, the research team interviewed farmers (62 women and 10 men) selected randomly because of bureaucratic constraints. Respondents were drawn from the major agricultural projects of Black Bush Polder, Linden/Soesdyke Highway, Tapacuma Irrigation and Parika/Salem land development schemes, straddling the three counties of Guyana. Profiles of the project areas and the respondents are given. The areas under study are economic role, perception of management capability, time use, work activities and patterns, returns from farming, tools and equipment, training, access to credit, ownership and conjugal and maternal roles. Among the findings are: women perform a multiplicity of roles which decrease their efficiency as farmers; agricultural training is absent, land ownership is controlled by the male. Problems identified included: exploitation, lack of practical advice for farmers and the availability of supplies. Conclusions include that the University of Guyana and the Ministry of Agriculture undertake a survey to determine why farmers are moving away from the land; and that local technologists design devices to make some agricultural tasks easier.

* 62 women, more than half of whom are between 45-64, and who are full time and part time farmers are randomly selected from the three counties Berbice, Demerara and Essequibo. The questionnaire approach is the major tool used to obtain information. The project areas are Black Bush Polder, Linden/Soesdyke Highway, Tapacuma Irrigation and Panka-Salem, which are chosen because they are the major agricultural projects; also because they straddle Guyana's three counties and the population represents a socio-economic and cultural cross-section of the major ethnic groups of the country. Farming is the major income activity for all the women interviewed, of whom 60% claim household headship. A profile featuring age, religion, education, family size of the women is given. Also an outline is given of social amenities in the area pertaining to health, transport, recreation, day nurseries etc. Areas under study are: economic role, perception of management capability, time use, work activities and problems, returns from farming, tools and equipment. training, access to credit, income ownership, and conjugal and maternal roles. Some findings are that women perform a multiplicity of roles in the course of living which decrease their efficiency as farmers, that agricultural training is absent, that land ownership is controlled by the male partner. Problems identified are: exploitation, lack of practical farmer's advice, procurement of supplies. Recommendations include that the University of Guyana should undertake a survey together with the Ministry of Agriculture to determine why farmers are moving away from the land, that negative attitudes to farming be offset by programmes aimed at improving the image of the farmer, that local technologists design devices to make some agricultural tasks easier, that communication strategies be planned to accommodate farmers and that women's groups assist with family related problems.

Women in Caribbean Agriculture research/action project: overall report and summary of main findings / Joan French. Curepe: CAFRA, 1988. ii; 75 p.: tbls. Women in Caribbean Agriculture Project. General

* Study of women in agriculture centred around five rural communities in Dominica and St. Vincent, these two islands selected for their predominantly agricultural economies. The main focus of the investigation was to examine the activities of women in agriculture, taking into account the comparative emphasis, value and time placed on their activities in the household as well as in the field. The research project was based on the theoretical assumption that a study of women's activities at the household level is necessary for a full reflection of women's labour, agricultural and non-agricultural. The report notes the use of novel research methods, combining participant-observant techniques, with the collection of statistical data, while at the same time introducing an element of training and consciousness raising within selected communities, together with mutual sharing of experiences. The long term aim of the project was to strengthen the position of women involved in agriculture as a viable economic base for Caribbean countries; to raise consciousness with regard to the contribution of women to all aspects of agriculture; to bring an understanding to female agriculturalists of their economic importance and potential for development; and to develop parameters for the quantification and analysis of women's work in agriculture and their contribution to the economy. Short term goals were to generate a concrete data base on the situation of women in agricultural production; to develop a participatory framework among women researchers and agriculturalists for the analysis of the current situation and the possibilities for change; to compile comparative data on women and agricultural production in the Caribbean region and to develop action programmes aimed at improving and strengthening the position of women in agricultural production. Wide-ranging conclusions embody these aims and emphasize the need for national statistical machineries to collaborate with women's organizations locally and regionally to ensure the inclusion of relevant sex-differentiated data in all national, agricultural or general censuses.

* Provides historical background on trade in agricultural commodities among the Caribbean islands, documenting the periods of intensive activity and periods of decline. The activities of women traders are set against current national and regional policy and trends in agricultural production, international marketing and extra - and intra-regional trading patterns. Indicates the value of the traders' activities to Caribbean economies as well as to the income-earning capacity of the traders themselves. The report notes a threat to the continued existence of this informal sector owing to the persistent lack of support facilities, training in marketing skills and government incentives. Recommends that governments and the general public should be sensitized to the importance of the inter-island trade in fresh agricultural produce for the region, calls for the provision and upgrading of facilities for the traders and for the promotion of associations of traders. The study notes the significance of women's participation in the economy and emphasizes the implications of the decline which it states might result in the loss of a vital service in food supply for the region and loss of income for a large group of women who are sole providers for their households. Further research is proposed. Includes case studies.

- Outlines general aspects of the Women in Development Programme of UN.ECLAC Subregional Headquarters for the Caribbean. Presents preliminary findings of ECLAC study on inter-island traffickers from St. Vincent and the Grenadines, the majority of whom are female, with an average age of 30 years. The complete marketing function is carried out by the trader and encompasses a variety of functions from negotiation, through shipping to wholesaling and retailing. Credit facilities are limited so women traders have developed creativity in conducting their business. Describes the Traffickers Small Business Association founded in 1983. Five recommendations are made among these being the promotion of the organization of women traders and increased inter-island networking of women traders.

* Document based on a study for inter-island traders initiated by the Women in Development Unit of ECLAC Subregional Headquarters for the Caribbean. Responds to subregional concerns about lack of data on women's contribution to development by examining women's share in the marketing and distribution of agricultural produce in the region. Study reveals a trend, since the 1950s, of increasing participation by women, who now dominate in the inter-island trade and command a substantial share of the market. This. occurring at a time, however, when, overall, intra-regional trade is on the decline. The increase in women's participation is attributed to several factors: among them, the limited employment opportunities otherwise available to women; the withdrawal of male traders from trafficking to new opportunities occurring in the industrial sector; improvement in travelling facilities; the existence of established social networks; and the opportunity for marketing surpluses of agricultural produce by filling a gap in a sector once occupied by government marketing boards. Identifies Trinidad and Tobago as the main market for traders from St. Vincent and the Grenadines, documents problems faced by existing traders and recommends the development of support services necessary for sustaining activity in this informal sector, which of economic importance for the Caribbean. Recommendations include: the establishment and growth of traders associations; training in market skills and trading practices; the introduction of schemes for greater access to credit; and improvements in working conditions in the form of shelter, sanitation and child-care facilities. Further research is also recommended.

- * Women traders are mainly from the low income or no-income bracket. According to the report, there are two types of trade in the informal sector: one that is envisaged and created by women for economic and other needs; and the other which is permitted and controlled by the parameters of the CARICOM Agreement. Details are provided of buying patterns, types of merchandise, and the hazards which must be confronted because of legal restrictions. It is suggested that co-ordinated planning in agriculture and trade, the zoning of industries and the expansion of facilities at the Central Market would go a long way to lessening current inconveniences. The implementation of these proposals would also contribute to a more efficient and vibrant trading system.

* Thirteen problems arising out of the presentations are identified. They include, 1) the variety of vocational training opportunities offered at national levels and the apparent lack of linkage and relationship existing between sponsorship agencies in terms of programme content, structure and relationship to each other; 2) the apparent lack of consistency in the specific relationship of vocational training programmes to national development projects and programmes; 3) the apparent difficulty in recognizing the human resource needs of the various countries and the inability to utilize the skilled resources of women; 4) the problems of development planning without a thorough and prior analysis of the human resources training needs related to the specific areas planned for or envisaged e.g. in tourism; 5) the apparent need for planners and policy makers to treat with urgency and priority the collection and use of human resource assessment such as inventories and evaluations in the aspects of national manpower, sectoral manpower, project-related human resources; 6) the need for standardization of certification or accreditation in similar areas of skills; 7) the frustration of vocational training efforts by societal attitudes seems to be treated with too high a degree of indifference; 8) to implement research studies to assess the societal need for skills, not only those of projected large scale development plans, but the needs of the householder and the general community.

* In Antigua, the Technical College provides technical/vocational training on a standardized basis. Pre-vocational education is offered in some government schools. Statistics indicate that the male enrollment for welding, engineering, auto mechanics, electrical installation, etc. is higher than that for females but in the business education and hotel and catering courses, though a fairly high percentage of males enroll, there are usually more females. It is still traditional that tasks which demand more strenuous labour are pursued by males, though females are free to enroll and take their place as equal partners in the work force. Over the years, there have been only a few female graduates in the traditional male fields, but their impact has not been felt on the labour market. A development statement is made, the broad aim of which is to provide educational facilities and create opportunities to allow all individuals to contribute towards national development. Areas of emphasis include training of teachers, improvement of home economics centres and handicraft programmes, and assisting the industrial sector by preparing a more skilled than semi-skilled work force. The work of various non-profit and non-government organizations eg. Department of Extra Mural Studies (U.W.I.), Women's Desk, Caribbean Conference of Churches, is noted. Marketable skills are said to be needed in the tourist and garment industries. Courses in all areas are aimed at improving the social as well as economic status of women. Government plans for the future are outlined.

* The paper posits the exploitation of Suriname women, first at the hands of an initial foreign domination, and secondly since the 1980 military overthrow, at the hands of their men, who after having profited from their support, excluded them from the decision-making and management machinery. The education system is seen to promote care-taking jobs for women, even if they are qualified to be better employed. The launching of the National Women's Bureau is welcomed as a step to change the structures that influence the status of women in the country. It is observed that women have far fewer opportunities to work independently towards self-development, are a source of cheap labour and the first to be discarded in times of unemployment. It is expressed that the right to a meaningful job and a greater variety of educational opportunities and facilities for women who participate in the labour process, are essential to the integration and participation of women in the national socio-economic development. Some activities of the National Women's Bureau are outlined including, social advice and assistance, information dissemination on women's activities and assistance to pregnant women. The vocational education achievements for women are also outlined. They include 1) in 1970 handicraft and home economic training at a government centre, reorganized in 1977 to include carpentry, auto-technics etc. for both men and women, 2) a "drop-out" project for young people, 3) plumbing for women, 4) vocational training for the disabled. Co-ordination is done by the Centre of Labour Mobilization and Development of the Ministry of Labour. This paper envisages equal opportunity for both sexes that would eliminate the need for special women's organizations and programmes.

- * Within both primary and secondary education levels the only vocational course available to women is home economics in the one high school. Tourism is the main industry and on-the-job training is provided for those who are employed there. It is noted that women do not apply for nor are given jobs that the society feels should be done by men. In August 1981, the British Virgin Islands Hotel and the Tourist Association conducted a 2 week workshop for women. In the second largest sector, construction, women participate either as secretaries or as architects. Private companies grant scholarships to women in the areas of typing, shorthand, commerce and bookkeeping. Government also offers training opportunities overseas for men and women. There are no other vocational training activities sponsored by Government or voluntary bodies. Though there is a need for the co-ordination of vocational training for women so that they may take their place in the development of the country, there seems to be no urgency to make any move in this direction. It is hoped that the Seminar will provide a stimulus for the vocational training of women.

* A demographic, economic and labour force profile is provided. Vocational training is said to be done, not only in Government institutions but by other organizations like the Social League, a women's organization, the Northern District Progressive Women's Club, and the Women's Institute of Portsmouth. All 3 organizations carry out basically the same type of training. The activities increase opportunities for the employment of women and also help them to build better homes and to participate in the economic, social and political development of the state. The Clifton Dupigny Technical College, a government institution gives vocational training to many young people every year. There are both part-time and full-time courses. A junior secondary programme has recently been launched by the Education Department and the Technical College is expected to provide further skill training on the job so that school leavers can keep up to date in their chosen field. The first phase of the economic development plan which will guide the vocational training programme to be offered in Junior Secondary Education, is outlined in six areas:- food production, construction, garment production, machine shop and welding, arts and crafts, services.

A breakdown is given for vocational institutions with numbers indicating skill-area and sex enrolled, for each. Generally, education is directed at the population at large against the background of a national policy of co-operation. - * A labour profile is given outlining the difficulty in finding limited employment. The re-establishment of the Youth Employment Service has indicated that 90% of those who register are women. The service is successful in finding the un-skilled jobs. Industrialization efforts have opened up opportunities in factories for women and some factories carry out in-service training for employees. Vocational training centres and their programmes are outlined, where the main area of concentration for women is in handicraft and textiles. Some of these areas are the art of smocking, shell jewellery, dress-making, macrame. The Technical College provides formal training in secretarial work, refrigeration, mechanical engineering etc. The Extra Mural Department runs home and community improvement courses for women, at the end of which sharing of the training gained is encouraged. addition, the Organization for Rural Development, the National Council of Women, and the YWCA, initiate self-employment programmes for women in areas such as nutrition and food demonstration, the making of preserves, and dress-making. - * Individual assessments of each of the six projects undertaken in Antigua, Barbados, Dominica, Jamaica, St. Christopher and Nevis and St. Lucia are discussed. Each assessment follows the same format - an introduction, design, strategy, project performance and achievement of objectives, role of women, general lessons and recommendations. The team concluded that in general the achievements of the projects were significant. The projects have contributed to the creation of awareness of the problems of teenage pregnancy and related issues. In addition, even though these are still sensitive issues the very implementation of the projects is an achievement. It is felt that delays were caused by project design, strategies and monitoring/evaluation even though the mission felt that the design of the projects had improved over the years. In each evaluation, the section on general lessons drawn from the particular project are suggested as input for use in future UNFPA projects. Educational attainment of women in Trinidad-Tobago, 1946-1980 / Patricia Mohammed

In: Women and education. Cave Hill: UWI. ISER, 1982. pp. 35-77. (Women in the Caribbean Project, vol. 5).

Women in the Caribbean Project, Phase 1. General ----> CDC 3328

- * The paper analyzes the post-World War II educational attainment of women in Trinidad and Tobago. It supports the view that ideologies influence the provision of education for women but recognizes that education cannot be meaningfully analyzed as a separate and autonomous social institution since it articulates with other structures of the society. Female school attendance (78.4) is shown to have outstripped male (77.7) most markedly in the 15-19 age group by 1970, when the introduction of free secondary education began to reflect the larger ratio of women to men in the population. It is found that girls perform better than boys at 'O' Level and are in the majority up to this level. The trend is, however, reversed for tertiary and higher education where more males than females are enrolled. It is also found that at vocational and technical levels in 1976-77 the majority of women are enrolled in traditional courses. A positive correlation is also shown between women's education and their labour force participation.

* The analysis and recommendation are made against the background of the Regional Plan of Action, the aims of which are outlined. Describes existing conditions so as to evaluate how much progress has been made in achieving the objectives proposed by the Plan. The situation of men and women in different countries and within each country is compared with a view to discovering which countries have the worst educational conditions, in which aspects of the system the greatest inadequacies are to be found, and in which the differences between the educational situation of men and women, are most pronounced. It is observed that the greatest differences detrimental to women occur in the countries with the lowest educational levels. Further assessment reveals that in the region a wish to improve and extend the coverage of the educational system has meant substantial progress. However, the changes are being introduced slowly and, in general, the qualitative aspects of the content of the instruction provided are overlooked. Accordingly, by transmitting content which corresponds with sexual stereotypes, education is one of the means by which the existing situation is maintained. If this were altered, it is possible that education might be a powerful instrument for changing the status of women.

Recommendations for primary education are levelled mainly at illiteracy in rural areas, and secondary education at eliminating discrimination vis a vis the job market and social life. As for the appraisal of the Plan itself, procedures for pertinent information collection are suggested.

- * An overview is given of the seminar which was the first step in the implementation of the Caribbean aspect of an ILO/CINTERFOR project aimed at the establishment of pilot co-ordinating units/mechanisms for the vocational training of women in the Latin American and Caribbean regions. The framework for the project is outlined and its purpose given as that of developing a mutually supporting chain or linking mechanism to ensure the success of efforts both to the trainee and to the fulfillment of the goals of integrating women more fully into the development process. The method of the Caribbean aspect of project implementation involved the use of questionnaires sent to member countries and findings are indicated. The document contains the full proceedings of the seminar at which country-papers were presented, general perspectives for strategy were outlined, and workshops undertaken. Among conclusions are that within the region many vocational training programmes are offered that are not relevant to national development goals, that few programmes have taken effective measures to integrate women in national development programmes, that there also appears to be a total absence of co-ordination of vocational training programmes. Recommendations include that national co-ordinating mechanisms be established during the pilot phase of the ILO/CINTERFOR project, that during the pilot phase, these mechanisms take the form of national advisory councils the composition, objectives and functions of which are detailed. Additionally the Seminar served to make participants aware that not enough was done within individual territories on the matter of effective vocational training and that a greater level of co-ordination was needed. Included is an Appendix on vocational training programmes for women from the CARICOM Secretariat.

* Concludes that the projects evaluated have contributed to pioneering efforts; the creation of awareness of the problems of teenage pregnancy and related issues; a more open and informed discussion of personal issues and the establishment of confidence and respect in programme efforts regarded as controversial. The projects were noted to have made good progress toward the achievement of their immediate objectives, however it was also noted that in several cases they had not been fully achieved. Problems in project design, strategy, management and evaluation were common. Outlines conclusions under headings: project design and strategy, training, in-school and out-of-school family life education, family planning service delivery, management impact and role of women. Twenty-four lessons of application to programmes addressed to adolescents are outlined. Among recommendations is that family life education/family planning programmes for youth be continued and expanded, the strategy being modified over time to adjust more carefully to needs and to take advantage of new approaches/ideas.

United Women's Woodworking and Welding Project.
General

- * Describes the operational experience of a project for low-income women in Jamaica. The Hanover Street Project. formally known as the United Women's Welding Project, is an experiment in training women for jobs usually held by men. Begun in 1976, this was the first such programme of the Jamaica Women's Bureau, established by the government during International Women's Year to ensure that women participate fully in Jamaica's development. Though the project is still developing, it has demonstrated that low-income women can learn non-traditional skills and can work together to improve their lives. Through trial and error the project is providing the Women's Bureau with a wealth of information about teaching technical skills, working with other government agencies and establishing self-sufficient co-operative structures. The knowledge gained from Hanover Street is being applied to a number of new projects organized by the Bureau in urban and rural areas. The lessons from this experience extend beyond Jamaica and it is hoped that they will be useful to people in other countries who are addressing similar problems.

- * Argues that despite the improvement in and expansion of the education system during the sixties and seventies, there has not been the desired economic growth and development which was hoped for, largely because of the failure of development planners to recognize the economic role of women and the contribution they can make to the development process. However, women have now begun to play a more active role in the development process, and this paper takes a look at some of the issues arising out of this 'new' concept of It examines the role that education, and development. particularly non-formal education can play in this 'new' model of development, and concludes that although a focus on non-formal education and on women's issues alone is not the answer to the developmental problems facing the region, yet they are tools that can be used by women and men in their struggle to transform their societies.

* Examines the major official reports and documents written during the period under review to understand the underlying ideological assumption which informed the education of girls in the Caribbean. Argues that the education of women in Barbados and other former British West Indian societies for this period was predicated on the ideological assumption prevalent in Britain at the time that woman's place was in the home. Although girls were not discriminated against in terms of access to schools, educational expansion introduced sex segregation and curricular differences leading to relatively inferior education for girls vis a vis boys. Their career choices were severely limited and those who worked were employed in the worst-paid occupations.

- * The survey sought to obtain information on female labour force participation in the Caribbean, female participation in vocational training, agencies administering vocational training programmes, and the status of co-ordination of vocational training in the individual countries. Questionnaires were mailed to 19 countries but only data for 10 English-speaking Caribbean countries and Suriname were received. The survey found that women constitute between 30-36% of the Caribbean labour force and despite what appears to be a higher level of participation of women in vocational training, women are overrepresented in clerical training and traditional skill areas associated with being female. Neither are women sufficiently represented among those receiving managerial or technical skills required for jobs that pay significantly well. Country responses regarding the relationship of vocational training to national development were found to be superficial. Eighty-seven and one half percent (87.5%) of the countries viewed co-ordination of vocational training to be necessary. It is recommended that a "system" be instituted to determine to what extent women are being absorbed into the labour market; that Caribbean countries collaborate regarding vocational training; and that a more in depth study of female participation in the labour force be conducted.

- * The questionnaire, interview and group discussion methods were used. Findings are that generally in the society, there is a low level of awareness of the importance of fostering the all-round development of the pre-school child. There is a great need to focus on areas of neglect such as the emotional and intellectual, which are apparent in the lack of planned programmes necessary to assure the type of learning experiences young children need to develop their full potential. If the quality of education of pre-schoolers is to be improved, there is also need for greater involvement of parents in the institutions with which they choose to share their responsibility for their children's development. It is felt that given an adequate level of awareness in the community about the needs of pre-schoolers, the Government's role should be that of facilitator, setting standards, though being mindful of not setting them so high as to discourage the growth of small centres. Government's efforts will need to be channelled to stimulating and fostering a spirit of self-help, self-development and greater local community involvement.

- * Shows how education practices continue to reinforce traditional male/female sex images. Argues that despite the fact that there is no significant difference between the sexes in abstract reasoning ability (a condition of high academic attainment) boys perform significantly better than girls at this level. Bias is seen in selected preference of male and female for courses in New Secondary Schools where industrial arts show a ratio of 1983:0 between boys and girls and catering 26:1 between girls and boys. Arts-based and science-based careers continue to be dominated by girls and boys respectively, hence education is completely women dominated, except at university level. Child-bearing beliefs also militate against the liberation of women who cling to passive job roles associated with home and domestic chores. A plea is made for the problem to be articulated and corrected via change in curriculum objectives, and the nation's attitudes and prejudices. The Five Year Development Plan with its expressed social goals should provide a springboard for change. Education statistics for 1974-1977 are given.

 Precise areas in which co-ordination can be established, the manner in which this can be achieved and the means of implementation are discussed. The importance of support services is stressed; most of the training activities being considered during the Seminar fall outside the school system. The view is expressed that there is a need to develop greater technical capacity and services which can initiate. promote and sustain vocational activities for women. National education and training systems are found to be overtaxed and sometimes unable to cope with normal in-school situations. It is observed that whilst developing and sustaining high academic standards the education and training systems have been slow in responding to demands of societies in meeting new technological demands, in satisfying the needs of socially disadvantaged groups and in coping with population growth. Also it is noted that in many situations there is a proliferation of training activities of questionable merit. The academic tradition has left those promoting vocational training for women outside the school system, the task of fostering attitudinal changes in favour of vocational training and the elimination of prejudices against the employment of women in some fields of activity. The demand for one kind of national educational training, integrated into national and education structures to improve effectiveness, respectability and attractiveness, is stressed. Major components and aspects of training which provide room for co-ordination of national and regional levels are discussed. They include 1) requirements and objectives of training programmes, 2) elements of designing programmes, 3) occupational or job analysis.

* The traditional view of women's occupations and men's occupations is seen to obtain. However, national development has occasioned the growth of secondary and tertiary industries and more attention is being placed on vocational training in general, and the training of women in particular. In the formal training areas, the secretarial courses and those pertaining to the hotel and catering trades are favoured almost exclusively by women. In the civil service, training for top level administrators is received overseas, and women feature prominently in this area. The private sector makes use of the institution graduates and provides mainly on-the-job training. However, in the light industry, technical, supervisory and managerial training is financed abroad by some firms, and a small number of women have benefitted. Diversification of the economy has created employment opportunities in industry in the hotel and catering trades and most of the additional jobs have been filled by women. This has highlighted the awareness that women have a vital role to play in the economic development of the state and that an organized programme of vocational training for this group is an integral part of the development process. Women's groups are increasing and more young females are availing themselves of training facilities offered by the private educational institutions. The need to co-ordinate vocational training in the territories is expressed.

* An overview is given of the labour force and the technical/vocational training facilities that exist. A 1981 labour force survey indicates that 45% of the working population are females. Vocational training for women is undertaken within the wider national development strategy aimed at reducing unemployment and increasing the pool of skilled workers. Over 1980-81, an estimated 3,700 persons are said to have benefitted from vocational training at various governmental institutions, of which 2,415 were females and 1,285 males. Although sex role stereotyping is noted to be still rather evident in the area of career choice, it is stated that the government seems firmly committed to a position of creating conditions within the society, which will enable women to achieve their maximum potential and to participate fully and on equal terms in the life of the nation. developments in the area of vocational training and in women's participation in particular are outlined. Female participation in some traditionally male areas has risen e.g. in auto mechanics, masonry etc. and greater encouragement is being given to females to participate in more non-traditional programmes in the technological fields. A need to co-ordinate training programmes is recognized and the creation of an Advisory Council for Training and Development (ACTAD) is

- * Presents views on how family life education (FLE) might be advanced. Summary of findings concludes that official policy is unclear and unsettled in some of the territories; that more training is essential; that the curricula and goals be standardized and upgraded; and that a better information service needs to be introduced. Recommendations for improving the training of teachers involves revamping the CFPA course in conjunction with the Faculty of Education and the Extra Mural Department of the UWI; that the Faculty of Education include in its Certificate programme a certificate in Education (FLE), and that this programme be offered via UWIDITE; and regular territorial training courses be introduced. A country-specific in-depth analysis of the teaching of FLE at school level would have to be undertaken in order to standardize the curriculum. A recommendation that CFPA be designated as the (Family Planning) FP/FLE Communications Centre was suggested. In summary the proposals require both an expansion of activities, and an extension of services to countries, even those not represented in its membership. Concludes with details regarding the expected outcome of the Conference, and with appendices covering the scope of FLE work: FLE in teachers' colleges: and the present coverage and proposed expansion of UWIDITE.

* An overview is given of vocational education in Jamaica. The Apprenticeship Programme which is essentially a work-study programme, aims at providing skills to satisfy the requirements of industry and to establish and supervise standards of training. It is governed by an Apprenticeship Law and in principle, vocational training is open to both sexes on an equal basis. However, female enrolment in industrial training centres is low. It is believed that the reason for this is psychological in that from early, girls are conditioned to perceive themselves in restricted roles. Reinforcement of such attitudes is seen in the wider society and the educational framework which directs girls to so-called "female" occupations. The Women's Bureau, of the Ministry of Youth and Community Development has been addressing this problem and has implemented five projects. They are 1) a workshop for vocational guidance counsellors and instructors in vocational training centres, to sensitize them to the need for promoting a wider range of choices for girls, 2) a pilot project, to demonstrate the interest and capabilities of women for non-traditional skills which might lead to self-employment, 3) the publication of posters highlighting women participating in non-traditional occupations, 4) the publication of a Guide to Skill Training Opportunities focussing on girls, 5) the development of a woodwork and welding project for women. A marked increase in female participation in vocational training has resulted and there is now 28% involvement, as well as female participants in all skill-areas. Co-ordination among agencies, ministries, the private sector and training institutions is seen as vital to maximize benefits from vocational training and particularly the integration of women in national development.

* An overview is given of vocational training activities which are sponsored either by government or by voluntary bodies. Government sponsored training is centred around the Montserrat Technical College, the only institution offering formal training, and enclave industries which are joint government/private sector operations. In formal training areas, secretarial courses have attracted the females, and mainly women are involved in the knitting, spinning, weaving, embroidery and sewing of the enclave industries. The efforts of voluntary bodies are said to be commendable, but difficult to classify. The Social League of Women in Plymouth provides training skills in plain sewing, wine making, tapestry and rug making, while the Women's League of Bethel is involved in a cotton cultivation project. Ad hoc Women's Groups have been organized by the Social Welfare Division of the Ministry of Education, Health and Welfare in different parts of the island from time to time. Skills in sewing, cooking and food preservation have been the main focus. More women are being absorbed in the job market. Statistics indicate that in 1970 out of a population of 11,458 there were 1,361 women employed where as in 1980 out of 11,606, the figure rose to 1,991. The majority of women are said to be now more economically independent and therefore more capable of improving their social standard in the community. A co-ordinating council has recently been formed to co-ordinate vocational education.

- * Examines concept of feminism, its origins and development against the background of 'Third World' perspectives on the subject, as well as contemporary global interpretations and focuses on the challenge of re-defining all boundaries of knowledge to accommodate some persistent realities emerging out of new feminist theory. Acknowledges the complexity of the task of disputing "many 'facts' of history and of science and, in essence, the very base of knowledge itself". Argument rests on the imperative of adjusting the educational, political, social, economic and philosophical hindrances to women's progress resulting from androcentric and, pertinent to the Third World eurocentric assumptions reinforced by male-centred scientific "cbjectivity". Advances the case for the continued inter-disciplinary approach of women's studies to the development of feminist knowledge as a re-affirmation of joint participation in the creation of a new emancipatory knowledge relevant to the Caribbean and to the world. The goal is "to re-establish the female as a positive human experience within and outside the walls of academe."

Women and adult non-formal education: the use of participatory methods in a community-based adult education programme in Rose Hall, Saint Vincent / Patricia Ellis; WAND. Wildey: WAND, 1982. [17 p.]

Pilot Project for the Integration of Women in Rural Development General

----> CDC 6205

* The use of a participatory methodology is said to have led to an awakening of the individuals to a consciousness of self, to an increased awareness and sensitivity and to a civic consciousness among the members of the community. The pilot project involved the community in the identification and analysis of its problems. Participants identified the following areas for focus: 1) raising the level of literacy of persons in the community; 2) providing more agricultural knowledge; 3) upgrading skills, especially in food preparation, storage/preservation and craft; 4) promoting self-development and development of the community. At the end of the first term of the planned adult education programme, participants evaluated the term's work. A high degree of interest in the wider community and a sign-off effect of the introduction of classes in neighbouring communities, are among the achievements. Problems encountered are: 1) although the need for the programme arose out of the formation of the farmers group, not many of this group (mainly men) attend classes; 2) during the second term, both attendance and regularity dropped. Overall benefits are improved skills in communication, analysis, problem solving, decision-making and confidence to take responsibility for shaping their own development and that of their community.

* Provides data about the development of the Caribbean as well as information about the education of women in Trinidad and Barbados. Education is one of the main factors defining the status of women within the Caribbean and the education available to women is also a major indicator of a society's progress. Joyce Cole's paper presents the view that during 1835-1945 education of women was predicated on the belief that "woman's place was in the home and her true vocation was that of wife and mother", and that this led to inferior provisions being made for girls' education. Patricia Mohammed's paper analyses the post-World War II educational attainment of women in Trinidad and Tobago.

role of the mother as teacher, especially in Caribbean societies where child-rearing is done by the mother. Examines the role of women in formal education, the employment of women in education and their access to specialist training and education. Discussion looks at women in their different roles of teacher, consumer, citizen, student and in popular culture and recommends the development of family life education programmes, the establishment of a regional resource base for family education, the revision of existing curricula to make subjects more relevant to needs, the undertaking of studies on child rearing practices, on women's view of their roles in society and on the impact of co-education and segregated schooling in educational achievement of girls.

Shows that while many women accepted the level of education achieved, they felt that the education received lacked vocational and practical relevance. Given the limitations of current female education and the limited economic opportunities available to women, most respondents regarded education as contributing to their material situation. Recommendations include: the integration of women's education with national development, expansion of non-traditional vocational training and opportunities linked with national development plans, expansion of continuing education for women and support for further research into the influence of education on women's self-concept.

* Achievements are evaluated within a theoretical framework, defined by feminist theory. Future strategies are then suggested on the basis of that evaluation. The general conclusion is that there have been advances and increases in the provision of health and education for women during the decade. However old ideologies still shape the organization of schools and their curricula. The sexist division of labour which education has re-enforced affects not only methods in education, but methods of health care delivery. The Decade has helped to identify and focus issues in health and education which have to be addressed now and in future decades.

* The efforts of the Women and Development Unit (WAND), as a regional agency within the Extra Mural Department of the UWI, are outlined as supporting and promoting programmes which help women to develop their full potential and contribution to their community. Established in 1978, the Unit works in collaboration with national and regional organizations through programmes of technical assistance, training and awareness building. Although not directly involved in national vocational training programmes, WAND makes an input through career guidance programmes in schools, and by providing assistance to income-generating projects for women. The ILO 1980 Report recommending that special measures be taken to ensure that women benefit from vocational training is seen to suggest 5 areas for focus training to influence top decision makers, guidance counsellors and the students themselves, pilot demonstration projects and utilization of the media. An outline is given of related activities and suggestions in each of these areas. It is noted. too, that WAND is also concerned about self-employment for women through the development of viable income-generating projects. In this regard the Unit's activities are outlined. They include encouraging and supporting the development of non-traditional projects, emphasizing the importance of assessing and ensuring that projects are viable, providing management training and skills to groups, including a component on self-development to improve the self-image and confidence of women, focus on craft and agro-industrial development, with emphasis on marketing and design presentation of the product. The exploitation of women in individual development, although greater employment opportunity is provided, is noted.

- * The principal focus is the mediation of men into the social and economic life of women. The primary sources used were the life histories of 45 Afro-Jamaican women born between 1865-1913, and case studies of four women born between 1865-1900. The interview method was used and documentary sources were used for background historical purposes. The age group under study is 14-60 years and there is a ten year difference between the age of the women in the case study to allow for the discussion of change. focussed on are, women's perceptions of the male function in their lives, creolization, contrary norm behaviour between male and female. The social-psychological interaction of the large primary unit subject to constant shifts and changes is posited as wide and one where an understanding is that there is no specific source of assistance with key life tasks. Findings are that these women are emotionally expansive and independent; that men are marginal to the women's economic activities but very central to their emotional and intellectual life; that the woman perceives the man's function as providing her with the foundations on which she could build her own-account enterprise; that men were providers of the resource base, guides to right social conduct, the bearers of new political ideas and were providers of emotional support. Economic independence is important to the woman's self-esteem. Community support systems are depended on for labour. Changing modes of life have affected the degree to which these are still present. Suggestions are made for encouraging female economic independence, and that more reliable bases for this independence be built.

* Identifies three main approaches of anthropological studies of the family in the Caribbean: Cultural Diffusion, Social Pathology and Structural Functionalism. Another approach which views family organization as an 'adaptive response' to economic conditions, is based on structural functionalism. These approaches attempt to 'explain' the family in a variety of ways. By focusing on women's roles within the family and correlating women with domesticity and men with public affairs, they have served to distort the reality of the majority of Caribbean women's lives. The relevance of a Marxist analysis of the family in the Caribbean is explored.

Se investiga la composicion familiar segun la relacion de parentesco y tipo de nucleo, asi como las caracteristicas basicas del jefe de nucleo, donde el sexo y la edad resultan elementos importantes. Se demuestra la tendencia al incremento de los nucleos reducidos, principalmente en las areas urbanas. Se evidencia que la edad de los responsables de nucleo tiende al envejecimiento, comportandose por tanto de manera consecuente con similar proceso que experimenta la poblacion en general y que acentua en el area mas urbanizada, independientemente del sexo. The paper reviews the research and critical literature on the Caribbean family from the 1950s to the early 1970s. * Highlights women's experiences of the familial role in three territories: Barbados, Antigua and St. Vincent. The ideology of womanhood which emerges from the sample of women is one which clearly adopts the traditional model of the role of women. The consensus was that while a woman may forego becoming a wife, she ought to become a mother. Vincentians represent the largest proportion among women occupying the 'dual roles', the latter being defined here as women in co-residential unions, married or common-law, who are economically active. The Vincentians have the highest proportion of women who have borne children and start child-bearing at a much earlier age than Barbadian or Antiguan women. Antiguans conform more with the traditional family model of the married wife while Barbadians show the highest proportion of married women.

* Within the context of the drive to improve contraceptive distribution, the document discusses a programme launched to test whether availability would increase contraceptive use. The programme was implemented in the areas of Fond Parisien, St. Marc and Leogane. Details are given of the design of the programme and the method of implementation. The main findings point to the efficiency of such a programme which effectively eliminates economic, administrative and geographic barriers to contraceptive use.

----> CDC 5593

* The main emphasis is on findings from a survey done in Jamaica in 1972 on fertility. An attempt is made to explain these findings in terms of the sociological context within which mating and contraceptive behaviour occurs. Areas discussed are knowledge, practice of, and attitude towards contraception, against the assertion of an ideal family size of three. The desire of couples for children and the extent of their discussions of family planning are also explored with a view to further understanding the processes of fertility and fertility Much of the behaviour is said to remain Widespread knowledge of contraceptives is contradictory. correlated with low usage; discontinuation of birth control occurs even where women are satisfied with methods chosen and do not desire another child. Many women express a desire for no more children, but have never discussed family planning with their partners, nor used a method of birth control. It is felt that age has a positive association with many of the processes examined. Facilitating mechanisms are said to exist in Jamaica for the spread and acceptance of birth control, however, the question of motivating the population still remains. There is a relatively low level of new acceptors and the possibilities for increasing their numbers are said to be limited. Inferences are drawn as regards user-efficiency and method-efficiency. It is hoped that with improvements in contraceptive devices, wider acceptance of the services will follow. It is observed also that the types of changes that may be forthcoming in Jamaica and which will impinge directly on fertility patterns, are the island's continued economic growth, rural-urban migration of women of child-bearing age, and the provision of educational and employment opportunities. In time, all these must affect the role of women and the concept women have of themselves in relation to their mating, child-bearing and economic activities, in a society where the role, status and economic function of women appear to be of prime importance in influencing both their mating patterns and child-bearing activities.

Dimensions of adolescent pregnancy in Dominica: an analysis and recommendations for change / Tirbani P.

Jagdeo. New York, NY: IPPF, 1982. 82 p. General ----> CDC 5754

- * To analy the problem of teenage pregnancy in Dominica, 31 girls between 14 and 18 years old, all from lower class families, were interviewed on their family background, perceptions of pregnancy, love and family planning and interactions with parents with regard to issues like menstruation, sex and school plans. In addition to dispelling the myths that teenage girls get pregnant as proof of their womanhood, to hold a man or to increase sources of household income, the study concludes that: the lower class family lacks the moral authority over children to bring about fundamental change in adolescent sexual behaviour and attitudes; parent-child interactions lack directiveness, guidance and reinforcement; teenage pregnancy results from the power of community patterns, limited access of teenagers to sex and contraceptive knowledge and the inability of the young to effectively integrate their attitudes into their behaviour. The findings are similar with those of a previous study on Grenada, except for the fact that fears and doubts about the safety of contraceptives are more intense in Grenada. Twenty-one recommendations are made with regard to improving the effectiveness of the Dominica Planned Parenthood Association's information and education services to teenagers.

- * Assesses the clinical effects of oral contraceptives, depo-provera injection and the intra-uterine contraceptive device (I.U.C.D.) on long term users. Two hundred and forty six patients island-wide participated in the study and this number was made up of 86 users of oral contraceptive 82 users of I.U.C.D. and 78 users of depo-provera. They were interviewed to identify problems with and attitudes to the contraceptive and clinically examined. This examination elicited no complications outside of those known to occur on the individual methods. Presents results under three main headings each embracing one of the methods. Recommends that the current clinic card in use could be revised under suggested headings; the need for increasing counselling personnel; that greater emphasis be placed on motivating suitable clients to accept sterilization. - * Questions the famed insignificance of the male role in West Indian society by examining a squatter settlement in South Haslington, Guyana. Argues that the mother-child family and matrifocality represent a breakdown or incomplete family form. The Guyanese squatter settlements are all racially separate as a result of the communal disturbances of the sixties and it is pointed out that in times of crisis the male presence in the family is essential. It appears that after several years male-headed households are superior in performance and status in the community, a fact that is readily admitted by female heads of households.

planning practice among 15-49 year old women. Mentions declining fertility in Jamaica and feels contraception could be a contributor to this. The world fertility index, discovers that 224,000 women in 1980 were exposed to the risk of conception with sub-groups qualifying as high risk women, teenagers having highest risk. Among these teenagers a large percentage was in a union and exposed to childbearing. The pill was the most popular contraceptive, but women, especially teenagers often changed methods and eventually discontinued contraception. Tabulates problems with methods, bleeding from depo-provera being very common with teenagers. Finds general acceptance of contraceptives, with areas of resistance possibly part of a belief that they could be harmful; an attitude which could affect the success of the programme. Males and females were strongly against sterilization. The former were aware of contraceptives; some used them. Sees men as very influential as decision-makers even when on the periphery of the family. Therefore they should be brought actively into the teenagers, especially during first pregnancy. Concludes that programmes should be sex-role oriented; should upgrade women's self-image. Women should be free to choose contraception and the government plans should support women

Fertility, mortality, migration and family planning in Haiti / James Aliman, John May

In: Population Studies, vol. 33, n. 3, 1979. pp. 505-521. General

----> CDC 1891

- * Utilizing data from the 1971 census and the Multi-Round Demographic Survey conducted between 1971 and 1975, this paper discusses population dynamics (fertility, mortality, and migration) in Haiti. In addition, the findings from recent small-scale micro-surveys are reviewed. These give further insights into the factors affecting fertility, among these, bio-medical variables like nutrition, contraception, infertility and infant mortality; and socio-economic and cultural variables such as union patterns and migration. Also considered are recent developments in Haitian family planning programmes and their impact on future population trends. The paper concludes that in the final analysis, the only solution to the problems facing Haiti, is an intensification of Haitian government efforts at social and economic development supported by substantial external economic aid over a relatively long period of time. However, a strong government population policy and more active support for family planning could play an important role in alleviating what promises to be even more serious population and social welfare problems in the future. Twelve tables presenting data on population fertility, mortality and migration are included.

- * Examines theoretical and methodological problems in the study of Caribbean family structures. Discusses the lack of conceptual clarity as to the meaning of matrifocality, distinguishing between female-centred and male-absent matrifocal units and asserting that level of frequency varies with such factors as definitions used, socio-economic class, migration patterns and ethnicity. Concludes that matrifocal units are not as prevalent or characteristic of the Caribbean as is assumed. Discusses the correlation between matrifocality and aberrant personality development of the child, pointing to the class bias of official delinquency statistics, positing that urban delinquency is not "caused" by family structures but by the unequal social system. Shows that masculine assertiveness, often associated with males raised in matrifocal units, is not exclusive to this group, concluding there is a need for less Western ethnocentric and more phenomenological analysis of Caribbean family structures.

Details are given of family and household structure. The system of placage, (conjugal union sanctioned by the community, but not the state), the unacceptability of barrenness, the dire poverty but persistent independence of the lower class women are presented through commentary on work done by Herskovits and Bastide. Particular emphasis is placed on the lives of women who are sole household heads, and whose prototype is Lamercie, in Colimon's "Fils de Miserie". Commentaries on other literary works, eg. reflejandose en argumentos tales como la libertad de la pareja en determinar el numero y esparcimiento de los hijos y la determinacion de la dinamica de poblacion a traves de programas de educacion, salud publica, etc. Se plantea como estas politicas resultan un derecho de la sociedad moderna y no deben confundirse con el control de la natalidad, ya que cubren aspectos de vital importancia como la mortalidad, la salud, la familia y la migracion de la poblacion. * Examines the reasons for the insufficient number of women, the attempt to come to terms with it, and the implications for the Indian community during the period of indenture. States that the colony received an undesirable low proportion of Indian women to men: of every seven Indian immigrants who came to the colony between 1838 and 1917 only 2 were women. When indenture ended in 1917, the proportion among the indentured Indians had grown to 40 women to every 100 men. Argues that major disorganization occurred in the area of traditional family life. Documents that the situation gradually worsened from the practice of polyandry to frequent illicit sexual relations between indentured Indian women and managers and overseers. The situation manifested itself in discontent and riots. Argues that the insensitive attitude of the colonial government forcing the Indians to go to greater expense to register their marriages led to a lack of registration and thus a growth in the number of illegitimate offspring. Marriages were also frequently broken because of a lack of legal ties. Positive changes include: immigration transformed the submissive role of women and enhanced their position; hastened the weakening and modification of caste distinctions by facilitating inter-caste marriages. Caste endogamy could not be strictly maintained. Concludes that the end of Indian immigration in 1917 brought substantial improvements to Indian moral and family life. A negative consequence of this period were the crimes of passion in the form of wife murders and assaults on unfaithful wives and mistresses.

* The Focus Group Research was used to solicit information from males on male dominance, money and support and sexual morality. Two groups, each of ten men between the ages of 20-44 were selected. One group was urban of middle, socio-economic status, the other consisted of rural residents of low socio-economic status. Varied marital status existed within the group from no-partner, no children to visiting and married relationship with children. Discussions were informal. "Women" is referred to mean specifically women as potential conjugal partners; brief comments concerning perceptions of "mother" are also solicited. Findings were that both groups reflected very similar perceptions though there were various levels. Distinctions stemmed more from exposure to education and middle class life styles than rural/urban residence. The groups were seen to place all "women" in the same category and to describe their character and behaviour in highly negative terms while identifying the ideal as totally out of reach. Distinctions were made between the "voung women of today" and those of the older generation. Views expressed were that it is the natural order of things for men to be dominant and in control of their women, and that women have no identity apart from their partners. On economic issues it was felt that it is an advantage for female partners to go out to work and that such women should contribute to the household finances and that women are avaricious and devious about money. On the question of morality women are distrusted. On "mothers" the urban group saw procreation as the major responsibility while the rural emphasized her as "special and different to woman"; both expressed obligations. A need to defend their traditional position in light of the progress of women is also noted.

- * Contends that slavery, the plantation system and resultant conditions of poverty are not directly responsible for producing matrifocality in rural Guyana, but are factors which thwarted the re-establishment of the kinship system from which it is derived. Traces the historical and cultural connections between Afro-Guyanese and the Akan-speaking, matrilineal people of West Africa, positing that the slave trade, slavery, plantation system, Christianity and Creolization, all contributed to prevent the transplantation of the matrilineal system in rural Guyana. Argues that the displacement of the male role, denial of anchorage in terms of collective ownership, and the improbability of gainful employment, lead to the adoption of a matrifocal family form, impeding the implementation of matrilineage. Concludes that the matrifocal unit is short-lived because there are no incentives for males to provide for and protect female siblings.

- * Presents a series of ethnographic observations as an aid in clarifying specific problems concerning the nature of family structure in three predominantly Negro villages in Berbice, Essequibo and Demerara. It examines the family organization, economic features, household structure, family group roles and norms, kinship and marriage patterns, and relations with the wider Guyanese society. Concludes that the villages are neither self-contained economic units nor units of production for society, but sources of labour for small scale farmers. Although the nuclear family is the norm in the wider society, variations like the female-headed household result from the strength of the mother-child relationship and the relative weakness of the conjugal bond.

Issues include: fertility trends and mechanisms of decline; contraceptive use and socio-economic associations; environmental effects, family planning programmes within the socio-economic environment; population policy; population influencing versus population accommodating policies. * Survey arises out of concern that the service statistics system might not have been providing an accurate count of the number of current contraceptive users being supplied by the family planning programme, and that little information was available about contraceptive use and pregnancies for women who stopped attending program-scheduled return visits. Data were derived from clinic records and individual interviews. The study represents all women who accepted a family planning method other than sterilization from all clinics, from 1971 through June 1978 in St. Kitts-Nevis, and from all clinics from October 1975 through June 1978 in St. Vincent. Findings are that overall, 85% of the acceptors have failed to keep all their scheduled appointments. There is a pattern of irregular attendance among the majority of acceptors and a significant number never return. This has led to 52% of St. Kitts-Nevis, and 33% of St. Vincent acceptors becoming pregnant since acceptance. Only 13% and 18% respectively were planned pregnancies. There is said to be no reliable information on contraceptive coverage from the commercial sector.

* This paper deals with women's responsibility for child-rearing and child-caring in the English-speaking Caribbean. It demonstrates that this responsibility stems from social and economic pressures such as single parenting, male sharing, and employment as well as from the cultural expectation that women should bear and/or rear children. The analysis is based upon the theoretical assumption that female access to sources of livelihood, power and authority, and emotional support systems, fosters or inhibits this familial responsibility.

- * The paper takes the view that Caribbean women have always operated in roles which span both "private" and "public" domains. As such, they have not always behaved in terms of the norms prescribed by the traditional sexual division of labour. The paper deals at length with two role areas, family and work, and draws attention to a gross neglect of attention to the work roles of Caribbean women. Education in relation to women's past and future roles is also dealt with. The paper ends with a challenge to social scientists to make a contribution to curriculum development and research, to promote a greater understanding of problems peculiar to women.

* The paper is the result of studies by ECLAC and research done in the region on rural women. The information obtained has been dealt with under five headings: the background and contexts of the Decade for women; rural women in Latin America; the rural family; women's demands and organizations and some policy recommendations.

Recommendations include the search for solutions at the local level, where the organization of women should play a leading role both in the articulation of their demands and in the search for solutions based on their own resources. The aim of the paper is to emphasize the most important aspects of the material reviewed and so the treatment of the above-mentioned subjects might be considered unequal.

- * The Saramaka are one of six Bush Negro tribes of Suriname and French Guiana. This study is divided into two parts: ideological background and social structure. The first gives an overview of the major principles with the help of which Saramakas envision their own social structure, outlining basic assumptions about social relations, certain closely related ideas about causality and the conscious model of kinship and locality. The second explores the role of ideology in social action, and describes the pattern of male emigration, residence alternatives, marriage, fosterage, inheritance and succession and land tenure. Finally, major themes of the study are reviewed to delineate distinctive characteristics of Saramaka society.

Status of women in Caribbean societies / Frances Henry, Pamela Wilson

In: Social and Economic Studies, vol. 24, n. 2, 1975. pp. 165-198. General

- * Surveys the literature on the status of women in the Caribbean. Looks particularly at the socialization of women; their economic and social roles; the attempts by women to capitalize on their strengths; the ways in which women are perceived by men as depicted in the popular idiom of the calypso. Concludes that the roles played by women in the Caribbean may vary according to the economics of their community, to the type of mating relationship they participate in and the type of household in which they live. Reveals that women do play subservient roles to men in many spheres, but reasons that this could be related to the severe economic under-organization of these societies. Finds that another aspect to the role of women in Caribbean societies relating to the male-female relationship itself is, the fact that women are often seen by men as manipulative strategists who clearly devise ways and means to obtain their objectives at the expense of men.

Survey on some aspects of family planning in rural Jamaica / Jamaica Ministry of Agriculture, Data Bank and Evaluation Division. Kingston: Ministry of Agriculture, 1980. 71 p.: tbls., diags. Limited

----> JMNPA

* Assesses the reactions of men in the age groups 18-50 years in rural areas to their spouses attendance at family planning clinics and seeks to determine the main reasons why they prevent their spouses from attending the clinics and using contraceptive measures, and the difference between age and socio-economic groups in respect to their attitudes towards family planning. Describes the three types of rural areas selected and the basis for selection; the method of collecting data; the survey design; the method of selecting sample units; personnel and training. Notes that the questionnaires were precoded and designed in such a manner that coding was unnecessary, that the editing, processing and tabulation was done on the micro computer in the Data Bank and Evaluation Division (this did not allow for more sophisticated analysis in the latter case). Infers from the data that the Jamaican family planning programme is very successful in reaching adult males of all social classes (even those in remote areas), with the family planning message; that rural males are fathering fewer children because of the effectiveness of the programme; that there is however a significant difference between the awareness of family planning and the use of family planning methods. Concludes that if the programme is to make an even greater impact on adult rural males it must address itself to the young working class adults, who however do show a greater sense of responsibility in that they are careful to prevent unwanted pregnancies by using contraceptives although they are against their spouses doing so. Notes that the reason for this paradox is unclear.

- * Distinguishes between Western conjugal family forms and other patterns of domestic organization and focuses on their relationship to economic structures. Analyses the social origins of the sexual division of labour, influenced by English domestic ideology dating to the 'pre-imperialist' early industrial period of 1780 to the 1820s. An association is made with the Clapham Sect a group of Church of England churchmen including William Wilberforce active in the anti-slavery movement, whose activities in relation to social reorganization coincided with the transition from feudal or agrarian-based economies to more capitalist and industrially-based forms, as well as the more sexually defined forms of domestic organization. With an underlying emphasis on functionalism, the study notes that this pattern of domestic organization was responsible for the compartmentalization of the roles of the sexes into the 'private' world of home and family, allocated to women; and the 'public' world of social production allocated to men, a concept that has become universally accepted. It is noted, however, that while the study and teaching of 'family' has for a long time been proscribed by these perspectives, they are today being challenged by what has been described as a renewed influence of history in social science, with a Marxist orientation. For the Caribbean, the study urges a recognition of ancestral forms of domestic organization, less discriminatory, and still remembered, as a means of legitimizing and democratizing Caribbean traditions as viable alternatives, if teaching and research meet the challenge of supporting the Caribbean woman's quest for social and economic autonomy.

Transition in reproductive behaviour in the Third World / John Bongaarts. New York, NY: Population Council, 1986. 29 p.: diags., tbls. (Center for Policy Studies Working Paper, n. 125). General

----> CDC 7176

* Review of the basic changes in reproductive behaviour that occur during fertility transitions. The relatively high pretransitional fertility levels are shown to be well below their potential maxim. This is due to the restraints imposed by biological factors (e.g., sterility and spontaneous abortion) as well as by behavioral factors (e.g., breastfeeding and postpartum abstinence). Chronic malnutrition and poor health are not considered major determinants of fertility. The timing of the onset of the fertility decline depends on an interaction between changing traditional and modern birth limitation practices. To obtain a sustained fertility decline, the rise in contraceptive practice early in the transition has to more than offset the fertility enhancing effect that arises from the abandonment of breastfeeding and abstinence. Once the transition has been initiated, fertility usually declines substantially, but in a growing number of populations fertility has been leveling off well above the replacement level. Convergence of actual and desired fertility and imperfect birth control are considered to be the main causes of this stalling.

* Four thousand, three hundred and fifty-nine (4359) women aged 15-49 and not in school were successfully interviewed in the Trinidad and Tobago Fertility survey. The most important findings of the survey include: women are now having fewer births in the first five years of being in a union; the proportion of women who have very large families (six or more) is declining; there are substantial differentials among subgroups of the population in level of fertility, generally suggesting that the effect of urban residence, higher education and labour force participation is to reduce fertility; 46% of women who were currently in a union and able to have a child did not want another child; the ideal number of children women would like to have was 3.8 children, decreasing from 4.7 children from the oldest age group to 3.2 children from the under-20 group; increasingly women are not breastfeeding at all or for shorter periods; there was widespread awareness of efficient methods of contraception with 95% of women knowing one or more efficient methods; 60% of exposed women (not pregnant, currently in a union and able to have a child) were currently using contraception, 18% had never used any method and 22% had stopped using; and 34% of women who wanted no more children were not using any form of contraception. In general, the trend is towards declining fertility which implies that the demographic transition is underway in the country. Further declines are needed to approach the level of zero natural growth.

- * An attempt to document and analy trends of use of contraceptive methods, to analy differentials in contraceptive use as they relate to demographic and socio-economic factors, and to assess patterns of change in differentials. Original data of World Fertility Survey in the mid 70s as well as surveys of knowledge, attitude and practice of contraception are used. Multivariate statistical techniques are used to isolate the separate effects of socio-economic variables. The twenty developing countries selected are grouped according to overall levels of development and strength and distribution of family planning programmes since overall levels of contraceptive use are related to these. Findings support this view. consideration is given to alternatives to contraception eg. abortion because of lack of comparable data. indicate a wide range in overall levels of use and use of modern methods, also size and trends of differentials have varied. Contraceptive use is related to delay and spacing of births as well as birth limitation. Education seems to be the most important factor explaining within-country differences. Generally, rising levels of education only partly explain rising levels of contraceptive use, education being related to overall development as well as strength of family planning programmes.

- * The description of Saramaka conjugal culture is set against the background of an entertaining Anansi folk-tale. The idea of one man having several women is said to be a primary determinant of the social life. Although both men and women characteristically have a number of lovers and spouses in the course of their lifetime, the imbalance between men's and women's sexual opportunities in favour of the men is seen to exert a profound influence on conjugal relations and on the character of social interaction more generally. An analysis of mother-in-law/daughter-in-law, wife-to-wife relationships, sisters-in-law, and husband/wife relationships, is done with a multiplicity of anecdotal references, emphasizing the subordinate position of women. A wife usually is considered by the village as "woman-come-to-a-husband", a status which controls her participation in community relationships. When a woman dies, her present co-wives are required to go through a period of intense mourning which functions in part to protect them from accusations of having contributed to her death. Of all the sets of mourning regulations that Samarakas recognize, only those for a husband or a wife are more stringent than those for a co-wife.

Evidence indicates that men have, from the beginning, acted as primary mediators between Black Carib communities and the non-Carib world and women have never lived in complete isolation from the outer world. Gives a summary description of Belize, the national setting for the study, and identifies some salient differences in employment opportunities for men and women. Discusses various aspects of social life, including property ownership and exchange, interpersonal conflict, age and gender and the reckoning of kinship and households and extended families organized around and by women as mothers. Outlines the sequence of rituals for the dead that both incline and empower older women to take the central roles in these rituals. Conclusions of the study include informed speculations about the part women have played in perpetuating ritual and other conventions of kinship and comments about the relevance of the research findings to cross-cultural studies of female status.

Women and the family. Cave Hill: UWI ISER, 1982. xvi; 162 p. (Women in the Caribbean Project, vol. 2). General ----> CDC 3327; JMNPA

* This volume is one of a series emanating from Phase I of a three-year project concerned with the role of women in the English-speaking Caribbean. The principal objectives of the study are to establish in the region a data base for teaching, research and planning purposes and to develop guidelines for a cohesive social policy which recognizes the needs of women and draws on their skills and talents for programme planning and execution. The monograph contains papers on female familial responsibility, the stresses that affect women and their families, women who head households and network analysis. The last mentioned paper constitutes a suggested model for sociological analysis.

* Provides insights into the characteristics and coping strategies of females who head households and identifies poverty as the major problem. Suggests that welfare programmes should be designed both to sustain and rehabilitate. In the latter, planners need to emphasize policies include skill-acquisition, income-generating and adult-education programmes for both males and females. The aim should be to provide not only basic necessities, but motivation and the capacity for self-improvement. Policies directed at females should aim at: 1) devising income-generating programmes that not only permit them to work from within the household, but provide them with the physical and capital assets required to do so; 2) ensuring that employment creation programmes contain a component designed specifically for women; 3) providing institutionally supported child-care centres; 4) expanding the opportunities for part-time work; 5) increasing opportunities for furthering formal education and technical training.

* Provides a synopsis of the situation of Latin American women, fitting them into an analysis of family life, considering both the attempts which have so far been made to acquire knowledge of their situation and the attempts which may be made to improve acquisition of this knowledge in the longer term. Considers the close linkage between the situations of women and the broader processes that affect their countries and the region. Gives special attention to the present situation and prospects of young women. Postulates the need to put forward proposals for the integrated development of women which would encourage an attainment of individual well-being and an improved quality of life as regards both the satisfaction of basic needs and the effective participation of women in the economic, social, cultural and human development process. Incorporates contributions made by ECLA to the study of the integration of women in development.

Women in Jamaica: patterns of reproduction and family / George W. Roberts, Sonja A. Sinclair. New York, NY: KTO, 1978. 346 p. (The Caribbean - Historical and Cultural Perspectives). General

----> CDC 1643

* This study provides the basis for an understanding of the position of women in Jamaica with special reference to their reproduction performance and family relationships. Bringing together both published and newly-acquired data, it covers many significant aspects of the lifestyles of West Indian women. Data collected on the formation of family unions, the extent and character of changes in the family structure, the three types of unions (married, common-law and visiting), the periods of time spent in each, as well as their relative stability have been discussed. Also included are many social and biological aspects of reproduction and child care in the society, such as pregnancy wastage, infant mortality, breastfeeding, support of children, family planning, menstrual patterns and knowledge of reproduction and menstruation. A summary of findings reveals that the visiting union is more common when compared with studies on Trinidad; effective contacts between father and children average 4 hours per week; the married union shows the highest educational performance followed by the visiting and the common-law unions: 10% and 12% of the respondents exhibited an adequate knowledge of reproduction and menstruation respectively; for infants delivered by nurses in hospital, the level of mortality is 37 per 1000 as compared with 67 per 1000 delivered in homes by nanas. Concludes that steps to upgrade knowledge of untrained midwives to help contain environmental factors affecting infant mortality be considered; that programmes of fertility control incorporate aimed at disseminating campaigns an appropriate understanding of the fundamental processes of reproduction and menstruation.

These reasons include traditional and historic factors, a high incidence of emigration, and economic and demographic arguments. The paper is concerned not with the determinants of female-headed households but with an elaboration of the characteristics of females who head households, the problems which they face and the strategies which they develop to cope with their circumstances.

Women's role in West Indian society / Joyce Bennett Justus

In: Steady, Filomina C. Black woman cross-culturally.

----> CDC 4631

* Presents an alternative model by which to evaluate West Indian matrifocality. Essentially international, it focuses on the family as a system of interacting members. It proceeds by examining the development of gender identity, gender personality and social role learning among men and women. Argues that the structural approach backs an understanding of the woman's role in her society especially in the significance of group solidarity and sharing. Suggests that the strong position of the female in society should be seen not as a form of deviance resulting from economic marginality, but as both an adaptive strategy and a value in itself resulting from an interplay of forces which originate in gender identity and personality, and of which economics is but one of many.

- * Se plantea la hipotesis que considera la lactancia artificial como factor social de inhibicion de la lactancia natural producto de la subordinacion de lo biologico a lo social dentro de la actual Revolucion Cientifico-Tecnica. La lactancia natural en la especie humana se cumple como tarea biologica con participacion de la actividad nerviosa superior, donde interactuan factores de excitacion e inhibicion de la secrecion lactea socialmente condicionados. Se realizan consideraciones sobre la influencia que tienen los factores sociales en el proceso salud enfermedad. Se ha demostrado estadisticamente que la alimentacion al seno materno en los paises industrializados y tambien en los subdesarrollados, constituye una necesidad primordial, así como una fuente importante y barata de proteinas. Se expone sobre la importancia de considerar un programa de accion consciente basado en leyes objetivas, que tiendan a promover la lactancia natural, como metodo de lucha contra la lactancia artificial y sus consecuencias, entre ellas la agalactia.

Se identifican algunos factores sociales y demograficos que influyen sobre el nivel de la mortalidad materna en esas provincias. Se detalla la forma en que se manifiesta la mortalidad materna por causas de defuncion y grupos de edades en las provincias y anos de estudio seleccionados. Se concluye que la principal causa de muerte la constituye el aborto, y que la edad avanzada, el bajo nivel de escolaridad y la inestabilidad conyugal son otros factores de riesgo de la mortalidad materna.

Strong support is requested for the establishment of an undergraduate programme in Home Economics at UWI and the project for the development of appropriate technologies in nutrition education, proposed by the Caribbean Food and Nutrition Institute. Notes that a curriculum in nutrition is to be designed for the first three forms of secondary schools and that technical training colleges have been requested to include a unit on breast-feeding in the curricula of Home Economics and Physical Education teachers. While continued experimentation is being carried out in the commercial production of a weaning food, the majority of member states favour family pot feeding as the most practical solution to the problem. * Special attention is paid in this report to the status of the elderly. Using the definition of the World Assembly on Aging, notes that women comprise the majority of the aged. Observes that, because of fertility decline and increased longevity, the elderly will increase substantially by the year 2000 - 580 million people over sixty years of age in a world population of six billion. Demographic studies also reveal that by the year 2000 more than half the world's elderly will be women and among those over eighty years, it is estimated that sixty percent will be female. Quotes a conference resolution calling for improved support services, care and infrastructure for the elderly through the combined effort of Government, the private sector and Community groups. Also refers to the development of programmes for the support of young women in making career choices; deficiencies in family law as they affect females; and the need for increased health education for women. Records progress and successes in the development of support systems for women victims of violence.

Seminar-Workshop on Women, Health and Development, Washington, DC., 30 April - 4 May 1984.

Five-Year Regional Plan of Action on Women in Health and Development Project. General

----> CDC 7225

• The first of six topics presented at the seminar-workshop was a conceptual framework for considering women, health and development (WHD) issues and problems. Notes that the health sector ought to recognize the economic contribution of women, not simply focus on their reproductive roles. Country presentations were given by the representative participants who provided highlights of the health and socio-economic status of women and the factors affecting these. The second presentation reviewed the development and content of the Five-Year Plan. PAHO specialists then described how their respective programmes are implementing the Five-Year Plan with reference to specific areas such as mental health, occupational health, nutrition, maternal and child health, family planning and environmental health. Country presentations then reported on activities being carried out such as health education and research on reproductive health problems. Major concerns voiced included the need to strengthen the national focal points, better data on women's health status, women as providers of health care, upgrading the status, rewards and influence of nurses, sex-stereotyping of occupational roles, and research on WHD. The process for monitoring and evaluating the Five-Year Plan of Action and activities to be held at the national level during 1984-85 was the final topic of discussion. Country representatives noted the major problems to overcome: lack of human and financial resources and lack of co-ordination among the agencies involved.

* Highlights general trends in health in the Caribbean. noting decline and changing patterns of mortality, a factor related to the general success in the control of infectious diseases, diarrhoeal disease and protein calorie malnutrition in children. Current trends indicate an increased incidence of chronic and non-communicable diseases. In all countries of the Caribbean, cancer, cerebro-vascular disease, melliltus diabetes and hypertension feature prominently as causes of mortality. Specific health problems of Caribbean women are identified. These include: problems related to child-bearing; anaemia; cancer, obesity, hypertension and diabetes; pelvic infection; alcoholism and drug abuse. A high incidence of mortality due to illegal abortions is also noted. Study reviews the health status of Caribbean women in relation to socio-economic factors such as unemployment, teenage pregnancy, women's multiple roles, sex stereotyping and the demands placed upon many women as heads of households and the sole support of the family as a result of divorce, widowhood and abandonment. Provides data on infant mortality and cites prenatal causes as a major factor. Recommends examination of existing strategies and plans of action and a review of women's health status taking into account the effects of structural adjustment.

* Briefly discusses the specific health problems affecting Caribbean women and examines the role of women as providers and consumers of health services within the context of the priority health issues identified by the CARICOM Health Ministers Conference in 1978. These issues are management, trained personnel, community participation, disease control, food and nutrition, environmental health and maternal and child health. Notes (1) that if women occupied a stronger position in policy making there would be more dynamic programmes to resolve some of the health problems specific to women; (2) that the more remunerative health professions are still male-dominated; and (3) that women have an important role to play in community health, disease control, family nutrition, environmental health and maternal and child health.

- * Report of the Committee of Officials Preparatory to the Sixth Conference of Ministers Responsible for Health, which was held in Guyana from 14-16 April 1980. meeting discussed arrangements for the Ministerial Conference and working papers presented on the following work programme elements: special problems of small states; future leadership in health; regional policy on primary health care; Management Development Project; drug abuse; disease control; and environmental health. Recommendations include: 1) that the Commonwealth Secretariat as well as other interested Caribbean states be invited to attend a special regional meeting to specifically discuss the health problems and available resources of the LDCs; 2) closest co-operation between UWI and the Regional Health Training Project whenever matters relating to continuing education of health workers were under considerations; 3) approval by the Ministerial conference of the objectives and activities proposed for the 1980-83 continuation phase of the Regional Project for the Education and Training of Allied Health Personnel and by participating governments of the UNDP project document; 4) that advertising of tobacco and alcohol should be banned from all media; and 5) that CARICOM Governments should, as a matter of priority seek to identify funds for setting up a Caribbean Institute of Addiction Studies.

* The meeting acknowledged the limited success of the WHO questionnaire on Women in Health and Development as a result of the serious constraints in the collation of data. Representatives of the CARICOM Secretariat, WAND, ECLAC, UNICEF, UNDP and the YWCA provided updates on activities of these agencies. Meeting concluded that funding should be sought for the inclusion of certain Caribbean countries in the PAHO/UNDP Women and Water Project.

Report on perinatal care in the (Eastern) Caribbean, part 1 / E.R. Boersma. 1982. 37 p.: charts Limited ----> JMNPA

* The noticeable lack of perinatal training led to a survey of conditions in the Bahamas, Antigua, Dominica, St. Lucia, St. Vincent and Barbados. Data were gathered on perinatal vital statistics; feeding practices in the early months, facilities to ensure adequate care of the newborn; each country's interest in training programmes; suggestions for the future and how to implement them. Adequate and informed staff was a general need, also care for at-risk pregnant women and the newborn in hospitals. All levels of health care and health workers needed upgrading, especially midwives, to reduce the incidence of handicap secondary to perinatal morbidity and the perinatal mortality rate. Recommends two types of training programmes - a 1-2 week on-the-job training and a 6-month training in a perinatal centre in the Caribbean. Public education was the most important of the other strategies suggested.

PAHO indicated that re-analysis of the health section of the UN Questionnaire will be done. Updates were given by representatives of agencies such as the Barbados Women's Bureau, the National Association of Nurses of Barbados, CARICOM, WAND, ISER, CARIWA and ECLAC. The former representative noted that a STC would be appointed for the promotion of the Community Participation Strategy, and the latter gave notice of the forthcoming "CARIBBEAN CELEBRATION" and news that ECLAC was preparing a film in which some references would be made to health projects implemented in the Region. With regard to International Year of Youth; and distributed it to all relevant Government Ministries; and the CCS Representative informed the group of the concern for an improvement in the quality of education in so far as it promoted the healthy development of young people. In the final agenda item, WAND'S Representative informed the Meeting that the International Women's Health Coalition had expressed an interest in meeting with Health Officials to develop programmes in the Caribbean.

Social and cognitive aspects of female sexuality in Jamaica / Carol P. MacCormack, Alizon Draper.

In: Caplan, Pat, ed. Cultural construction of sexuality. London: Tavistock, 1987. pp. 143-165. General -----> CDC 9300

- * Study seeks to determine the relationship between social identity, self-concept, affirmation of status and perceptions of sexuality. Explores historical, socio-economic and cultural factors, which impact upon the contemporary reality of Jamaican women, who are profiled in this study as "social actors who achieve their own status rather than passively deriving status from their husbands." This profile of independent woman is reinforced by statistics on marriage and employment rates: a low marriage rate in 1979 of 29 per cent among Jamaican women; and female employment levels of 47 per cent in 1978. Conclusions are also drawn from survey responses to questions on adulthood, sexual relations, reproductive physiology, employment and family responsibility. Insights on the Jamaican woman's perceptions of sexuality are based on the women's understanding of their physiology, social condition and self-identity and the study reveals a perception of sexuality based on traditional values and patterns of behaviour such as the importance of child-bearing and a belief in myths associated with many biological processes as well as with sexual activity.

- * A pilot project by WAND aims to promote and support programmes and projects for the social and economic development of women in the English-speaking Caribbean. It is hoped that this project will play a catalytic role in women and development and generally make an important contribution to the regional integration movement. This project originated as a result of PAHO's initiative to establish links between women in development and the Ministry of Health. The objectives are to establish a focal group of women within the office of the Caribbean Programme Coordinator in Barbados; to prepare a position paper on women's activities in the region; the collection of information on the implementation of the Plan of Action, the publication and dissemination of monographs on innovative projects which involve women in the implementation of health-related activities at community level; and to support a regional project focussing on women's participation in primary health care activities. The project involves the operation of two models to be tested in Barbados and Guyana. Each model will focus on: needs assessment; analysis of data; discussions with ministries of health; preparation of material for workshops; and arrangements for the workshops.

Incest as a social problem in Trinidad and Tobago: a qualitative analysis / Donna Henderson. Port of Spain: s.n., 1988. 60 p. General

----> CDC 7283

* The writer opted for a qualitative rather than a quantitative analysis of the subject because of its sociological sensitivity. This report explores the prevailing theories on the incest taboo - the biological theory (the prevention of inter-breeding); the psychological theory (the promotion of normal, healthy, psychological development of the individual by the containment of "natural and instinctive" drives); and the sociological theory (a social law regulating marriage). The report also notes the viewpoint of the pro-incest school of thought i.e., that incest can be seen as a positive and consensual experience, the prohibition of which does not withstand scientific scrutiny. The common reference to incest as "one of Trinidad's best well-kept secrets" is examined by the writer, who concludes that the "secret" is created by the overt denial of the non-participating member in an inter-personal triangle. Notwithstanding the pro-incest theories, the report cites findings related to the "tragic" consequences of incest post-traumatic stress disorder, self-destructive behavioural patterns, the long-term risk factor of psycho-social impairments, sexual maladiustments and even the economic impact of incest. The writer further notes the high incidence of mortality among children born of incestuous unions, as well as other effects such as mental retardation, educational sub-normality and some instances of physical deformity in bi-lateral cleft plate occurrences. The report places a great deal of emphasis on the need for media involvement in the process of developing community awareness, mobilizing community assistance and as a contributor to the deterrent factor. The media is seen as an important complementary system to the existing range of support and control systems legal, organizational, psychological, clerical, administrative and research - currently being utilized to address the problem. The report does not make any explicit cultural linkages.

Physical violence against women in Barbados; 1977-1985 / Merna Jordan. Bridgetown: Bureau of Women's Affairs, n.d. [50 p.]: tbis. General

----> CDC 6674

* The objective of this study is to document the type of violence most often encountered; the type of women most likely to be affected; the type of males most likely to commit those offenses and the reasons for committing them; and to ascertain whether physical violence against women is on the increase. Problem areas dealt with are rape, indecent assault and unlawful beatings; mental cruelty and neglect are excluded. No distinction is made between married or unmarried persons or of crimes of men against women and women against men. The research involved both a quantitative and a qualitative approach. Findings reveal that in the Caribbean the plantation mode of population during slavery produced the basic sexist myth that women exist to satisfy the desires of men. Statistics reveal that 70 percent of cases of violence reported are from households headed by single women; 22 percent of the actual cases of violence reported were for rape, sexual assault and beatings during 1978-83; and that 81.2 percent of all non-sexual physical crime was committed against women by men in 1985. Information on medical attention, types of injuries, the victim and the offender, social class, the police and courts, and the society is provided. Reveals that: the most serious physical injuries are committed by boyfriends and not husbands - during 1978-83, 94.86 percent of the victims appeared to know the offender and were able to identify him with some degree of certainty; the idea that mainly persons of the lower socio-economic classes were victims was questioned in light of the amount of unreported cases. recommendations: further legislation to clarify the law and effect procedural changes; a more efficient method of prosecuting cases in the courts; restriction of media coverage; projects to raise the awareness of women's issues to be directed at all levels of society. Concludes with case studies. Statistical data on offenses and crime are provided.

* The report cites the probable influence of television specifically the introduction of a cable service - in opening up "the Pandora's box of ignorance" surrounding the nature and consequences of violence against women. New awareness of the problem led to the development of the research project. Suggests preventive as well as punitive measures for dealing with the problem, which, it suggests, has its basis in alcohol and drug abuse and low educational levels. Documentation was obtained largely from among the "lower socio-economic bracket" of the society because of the "exclusivity" of the upper-class circles, and information related mainly to single females, owing to the methodology adopted by the researchers. Recommendations pointed to the need for educational and informative programmes on the rights of women, the need for strategically-located counselling services and further scientific and in-depth study to determine more accurately the scale of the problem.

* A collection of articles published in the newsletter BOSERO, voice of the Union of Antillian Women (U.M.A.), Curacao, November 1982. The issue is violence against women, its forms of manifestation and the silence surrounding acts of violence against women, its interpretation in the law. and the absence of institutional services for victims and of preventive programmes. Violence against women is defined in the context of socio-economic and cultural characteristics of Curacao society. The existence and apparent increase of cases in Curacao is illustrated by synopses of autobiographical stories written by victims, or by texts written on the basis of interviews with victims of the crime. The incidence of violence against women and children is analyzed from a perspective of gender inequality and interpersonal power relationships in Curação society which emanate from relations of domination and subordination and the limitations of the individual to reconfirm their position in such relationships.

* The chapter discusses women and political leadership, highlighting the fact that only 3% of elected politicians were women. It is found that political work, however important, is rarely the main activity of the woman. The article, however, points to discernible changes in this trend, eg. the active role of women in street level Revolutionary Defence Committees. Emphasis is placed on the fact that only since the Revolution, the problems of discrimination against women have been brought into the open and made an issue of public concern. The main conclusion is that though the victory of the revolution may have paved the way for complete women's liberation, there is still a need for certain ideological and cultural changes for the full revolutionary potential of women to be felt.

- * Argues that the desired transformation in the status and empowerment of women in Cuba remains unchanged close to thirty years after the revolution. Although women are credited with the success of Cuba's literacy, health and hygiene and productivity campaigns, they continue to be invisible in the country's top leadership positions. Notes that the large body of women mobilized for action through the Federation of Cuban Women continue to be subjects of male tokenism and unreformed attitudes; women are still trapped in a reformed version of the Roman Catholic Church's vision of heterosexual pairing as a production unit where women continue to manufacture the species, but do not determine its or their own destiny. Cultural images, the media and even Cuba's revised Family Code, the author says, remain strictly based on a masculine way of organizing sexual activity. Notwithstanding Vilma Espin's reputed dynamism in the Women's Federation, the question is raised: "Why wasn't even Vilma Espin a Minister?"

* The aim of the collection is to fill what is felt to be an information gap in the Latin American and Caribbean regions on the subject of women. The ideas are presented in debate-form to stimulate discussion on issues which influence policy-making. It is also hoped that women would take an active part in the process of their own liberation. The work is also meant to be a medium of demystification of the established concept of the secondary role of women. It aspires to create a concrete link between what is described as the flourishing, academic movement of the 60's and 70's and the promising beginnings of militancy in the feminist movement.

Elma Francois, the NWSCA and the workers struggle for change in the Caribbean in the 1930s / Rhoda E. Reddock. London: New Beacon Books, 1988. vii; 60 p.: illus. General

----> CDC 9265

- * Study highlights working-class resistance to colonial and racial domination in 1930s Trinidad and Tobago and brings into focus the dynamics of racial co-existence, tolerance and solidarity between working-class people of African and of Indian descent in that period. Charts Elma François' life from birth, in St. Vincent, through her struggles within the labour movement in the turbulent 1930s to her death in her adopted home, Trinidad, in 1944. Places significant emphasis on her involvement in the Negro Welfare Cultural and Social Association (NWSCA), of which she was a founding member. Francois' contributions to the working-class struggle in St. Vincent and Barbados are also documented. Presents fresh perspective on the growth and development of popular movements and early labour and political organization in Trinidad and Tobago, which is normally overshadowed by the record of nationalist movements of the 1950s involving the People's National Movement and the Democratic Labour Party. Study throws light on the history of trade union organizations existing today, the Seamen and Waterfront Workers' Trade Union (SWWTU) and the National Union of Government and Federated Labour Workers (NUGFW), which had their genesis in the NWSCA. Author argues that NWCSA, despite its name, embraced a membership that included Indians and Chinese; its ideology was humanist. Points out that NWCSA played a pivotal role in fomenting a national response against the Italian invasion of Ethiopia in 1935 led by Mussolini. As a biographical record of Francois' personal and political life, the study offers invaluable insights into the role of women in the region's political and labour history in what the author describes as an investigation into the lost history of women and of the popular classes and movements of this century.

- * Two periods of feminist activity can be clearly identified in recorded history. During the first feminist wave of the late 19th - early 20th centuries, women organized around such issues as the anti-slavery movement, the temperance movement, dress reform and women's suffrage. Theorizing on women comprised, in the main, women's attempts to rationalize their demands for emancipation within the framework of male theories of social organization. In the Caribbean region, the early women's movement developed in a variety of forms as recent research on the Spanish and English-speaking Caribbean, reveals. The women's liberation movement of the late 1960s to the present grew out of the tradition and struggle of revolutionary and Black militant organizations. During this phase, three theoretical positions, entailing certain organizational and tactical choices, emerged: radical, liberal and socialist feminism.

* The study attempts a historical analysis of the role of women in politics in Trinidad and Tobago. Part 1 covers the period 1925 to 1970 and situates the politicization of women within the context of the socio-economic conditions of the times. During the period Audrey Jeffers became the first woman to be nominated to the Legislative Council; Elma François, Christina King and Matilda Goodridge were in the vanguard of the working class movement of the 1930's; the Caribbean Women's National Assembly, contributed to the advancement of women, while the People's National Movement Women's League continued to retard rather than advance the cause of women; and finally the radicalization of women in 1970, as a consequence of the ferment of political activity which characterized this period. Part 2 examines women's participation in trade unions and non-political pressure groups. and considers the role of East Indian women in politics. The study shows that while women have been politically active, the system has placed limitations and restrictions on the scope of their political activity. It concludes that women as a group must move into action to fight against their subjugation as a sex and to assert their equality with men in the society.

* Presents initial research findings on female participation in electoral politics between 1951-81. The various levels of political activity identified are local politics, the Legislative Council, House of Assembly and Senate, membership on statutory boards, commissions and public corporations. Concludes that in recent years women in general have become committed to the electoral system, but have failed to use their potential voting power in support of feminist issues or female candidates. Maintains that women are still poorly represented in the national political arena and remain largely outside the circle of formal political power interests.

- * Examines the role of women as responsible citizens with particular reference to participation in politics. Contends that Caribbean women find themselves today in the arena of international politics even though they have had little opportunity to engage in local and national politics. They however must be prepared to engage in politics at all levels. Looks at the role of the Caribbean Women's Association (CARIWA) and women's involvement in community and national development. Suggestions arising out of discussions as to the provision of community education, rural programmes, information dissemination, use of the mass media in the development of women are outlined. Recommendations include the provision of career guidance for girls, the designation of a Women's Awareness Week, the establishment of national commissions to prepare action plans for the involvement of women at all levels and the inclusion of women on national boards.

- * Notes that although in many countries women have struggled with men for national liberation, at the end of that revolutionary struggle their position and power in the society as women improves little as the new era dawns. Women as producers of children and the means of continuation of society are subjected to specific forms of social and often violent control. In many post-revolutionary situations women are entreated to enter productive work, little consideration being given to the fact that they already have a full-time job for which they are not paid. States that the struggle is not only with men as men, but with the political system which maintains human oppression, and particularly with so-called revolutionary, socialist men who fight for freedom to oppress their women.

- Examines the sexual division of labour and the consequent exercise of political power mainly by men. Points out that socialism does not necessarily enable women to share power. In both capitalist and socialist societies, women perform the major tasks of social reproduction in its broadest sense. Yet this role of women in the development of societies is not recognized. Feminism, as a conscious political movement, is bourgeois in origin, hence the trend towards legal reform as the vehicle of equality. However, working class women in the Caribbean have played a role in the struggle against slavery and more recently within the trade union and political movements. Concludes that women need structures and organizations, in the first place, as support groups and also to organize within and against the structures of male power.

- * Examines Caribbean law as it relates to the status of women, focusing on family law as well as on laws pertaining to education, employment, citizenship and nationality and criminal law. Highlights examples of progressive legislation, as in the Sexual Offenses Act of Trinidad and Tobago; the Domestic Employees Act of Barbados; Legislation for Maternity protection, with a special focus on Dominica where maternity is protected on several levels - constitutional, by labour code and in specific legislation. Notes varying levels of regional commitment to reform in respect of citizenship and nationality laws, identifying St. Lucia, Dominica, Guyana and St. Vincent and the Grenadines as countries which have eliminated by law discriminatory practices whereby citizenship by descent or registration is dependent upon the male partner. In all countries studied no restrictions by law exist to inhibit the right of education for Women. * Concludes that although in principle, there is nothing to prevent women from playing a greater role in the political, economic and social development of Jamaica, there are, however, a number of practical obstacles to the attainment of this goal. One major obstacle is the inadequate number of child care facilities for working mothers. Another is the inadequacy of training programmes for women in vocational, technical and management skills. But perhaps the most important obstacle is the traditional attitude of men and women towards their respective roles in society. More intensive efforts must therefore be made to change the attitudes of men and women at all levels of Jamaican society, to allow for the total acceptance of women in all facets of political, economic and social activity in Jamaica. - * Paper interprets laws related to maintenance and property rights and highlights the issues affecting single women and children born out of wedlock. Notes distinction between legal protection extended to married women and children born in wedlock as against that provided for the common-law wife and children born out of wedlock. While married women enjoy clearly-stated rights to property and maintenance, paper points to shortcomings in the system which limit the court's powers to apply similar jurisdiction to common law unions. In this context, mention is made of the legal disabilities which affect the status of children born out of wedlock notwithstanding the beneficial provisions of the Status of Children Act 1980; and illustrates, by inclusion a court judgement, the legal implications of a claim to property arising out of a common law relationship.

- * Examines the resolutions and mandates enacted by bodies of the UN system which have special concern for the legal situation of women in Latin America and the Caribbean: resolutions which constitute international legislation and those which orient government action. Analyses each of the UN bodies included and the international legislation, resolutions and mandates which refer to the legal situation of women and compares this body of legislation with national legislation, the social situation and the awareness of the situation of women in the region. Considers the importance granted to women's legal situation within action plans concerning women at world and regional levels; fields of law at the international level which could give rise to future conventions, resolutions and recommendations; the level at which the body of laws emanating from the UN is reflected and implemented in national legislation; the degree to which this UN legislation reproduces or furthers national legislation; and, the imbalance between international instruments and women's legal and social conditions and levels of awareness of the problem. It is recommended that the report be used as an instrument of dissemination and reflection by making it possible to compare and place in perspective the immediate legal reality and, that it be used as a planning instrument by enabling the development of women's legal equality.

Looks at its continuous efforts to remove from the society, any factor which could lead to inferior treatment of women especially in social and economic matters. Mentions the new opportunities now open to women, and their involvement in national service, which has prepared them for their expected role in the society. Says complete equality between the sexes depends largely on improvement on the psychological and cultural environment of the society. Examines the problem from the legislative level stating that this can aid in the general process of transformation, not only to modify formal behaviour but also those deeply engrained prejudices and beliefs. Instead, the media should be used to advance egalitarianism and to improve the status of women. * The Barbados-based Syndicate was set up in July 1978 as a result of recommendations arising out of the 1975 workshop on Women in Communication for Development held in Jamaica. It aims to increase the flow of news and information on the participation of Caribbean women in the development of their society in order to accelerate the acceptance by the wider society of their new and expanding roles. In its first three years, 76 features were produced for the print media, the majority dealing with women's involvement in agriculture, nutrition and industry. Generally, the media have welcomed the idea of a features service for women but few newspapers have used them consistently, suggesting that the predominantly male-controlled media regards the features as marginal in importance. Other problems noted are the failure of some newspapers to credit the source or the writer and the superficial treatment of issues in some of the features. In the future, the Syndicate proposes to promote its full potential through the use of radio, in consultation with national women's organizations.

Evolving calypso history of women / Patricia Mohammed

In: Trinidad and Tobago Review, vol. 11, n. 7, 1989. pp. 15-16: illus. General

----> CDC Serial

* The calypso has a long history as a versatile social instrument. Calypsoes have been used to ridicule those in power, to protest against class or racial oppression, to display the command which the performer has of the language and for entertainment among other things. It has always mirrored gender relations in the society. A brief examination of the lyrics of some calypsoes over the last decade shows not only how sexual relations are being affected by the changing circumstances of women and the concerns of men and women as this occurs. Some male calypsonians but moreso female performers have begun to challenge the popular stereotypes which portray women as manipulative, sex objects or figures of ridicule. Calypsonians have sung calypsoes on issues which affect women most, in particular physical abuse, sexual violence and the consciousness of women's independence.

How media values affect Caribbean women / Barbara Gloudon

* Examines how women are informed, educated and entertained by the media and the effect which values imposed by the media have on women. Notes that news content is affected by ownership and by how the society has traditionally regarded women. Hence, in a society which sees women as toys and where media owners do not consider women and women's issues to be important, "the selectivity of news which affects women is certain to reflect that indifference". This is borne out in an analysis of the issues that are deemed newsworthy by the media: beauty contests, successful women who pose no threat to the status quo and fashion. Positive developments are noted in the use of the media to educate women while the entertainment value of television is criticized because it provides few "role models of women who are bright and witty and can make people laugh without degrading themselves". Concludes that media values affect women to the extent that women wish to be affected and that women's response is conditioned by the history of media itself and the sociological and historical context in which Caribbean women are informed, educated and entertained by the media.

Images of men and women in the 1930's calypsoes: the sociology of food acquisition in the context of survivalism / Gordon Rohlehr

* This is a thematic analysis of male-female conflict, fictionalized in the calypsoes of the 1930s. Nine themes are explored within the context of hunger, unemployment, economic depression and sheer survivalism which characterized the period. These include the virtues of a woman, women's downfall, idealized women, the battered woman and the rebel woman. The 200-odd calypsoes which are considered, support the assertion that many calypsoes were male rationalizations of felt inadequacies, or served as therapy via wish-fulfillment. The study views male-female conflict as the logical product of the context of survivalism in which both men and women were placed and notes that the way men dealt with women was an extension of the way they dealt with each other. It recognizes however that the conflict as presented represents observed reality from a male perspective.

- * In view of North American research findings on the negative sexist portrayal and sex-role stereotyping of women in television advertising, a content analysis was undertaken of all advertisements appearing during one week of programming on Jamaica's sole television station. The research findings supported the propositions that virtually all off-camera voice-overs are male, advertisements are geared primarily to women, the settings of advertisements show women inside the home and men outside the home, women are shown primarily as sex objects and/or as decorative appendages to men, women are almost always invariably portrayed as being young, the marital status of the woman is more often apparent than that of the male, and, women are shown doing activities with men being the beneficiaries of these activities. On the basis of certain premises, recommendations are made for changing the portrayal of women in advertising, including: research into media images of women from a historical and developmental perspective; national programmes and educational seminars on the role and impact of advertising; and the establishment of guidelines to discourage negative, sexist stereotyping of women in advertising.

Images of women in the literature of selected developing countries: Ghana, Senegal, Halti, Jamaica / Kathleen M. McCaffrey. Washington, DC.: US. AID, 1978. 230 p. General

----> CDC 4668

* This study explores the most frequent recurring images and perceptions of women in the imaginative literature of Ghana, Senegal, Haiti, and Jamaica; it provides an analysis of these images to provoke alternative ways of viewing some of the persistent problems in the area of women in development. It also provides a cultural frame of reference to be used by programme designers in devising and revising strategies to integrate women into the development process of the countries concerned. The study is organized around four main areas; work and food production, motherhood and the value of children, the structure of the family, and health and nutrition. The study consists of five sections, one devoted to the literature of each country, and a final section on African-Caribbean cultural transfers. Each section is preceded by a brief synopsis, highlighting the major findings in the last 20 to 25 years. In addition to imaginative works, analytic works have also been used to complement and to supplement the literary images. The project was structured in two phases; phase 1 encompassed the research and analysis of materials available in the U.S.; in phase 2 the author traveled to the four countries to obtain materials and to verify findings and conclusions. The persistent problems met by women in development are recurring themes in the artistic works of these LDCs.

Symposium on Women in Caribbean Culture, 1, Bridgetown, 24 July 1981. General

- * Deals with: 1) the Caribbean woman in the culture of the 17th, 18th and 19th centuries and the art forms used to describe that experience; 2) the Caribbean woman in both the culture of the 20th century Caribbean and the myths and realities as defined in the work of male and female artists and through papers presented or laid at the symposium. Describes Caribbean women as artists today - the factors that encourage or inhibit their art and recommendations for the future. A summary is also provided of papers delivered at the Conference. Two statements on the role of women in culture are seen to emerge from the symposium: 1) that the Caribbean woman must be allowed to realize her full potential in her society, for out of this, the liberation of both men and women will take place; and 2) that some of her techniques of survival and adaptation, despite her history of pain, deprivation and oppression, offer a positive archetype of 'womanhood'.

* Argues that women achievers are regarded as curiosities in a male-dominated world and that the media should move towards focusing on the newsworthy rather than the sex of the newsmaker. Recognizes that in a male-dominated press those who appraise the news are mostly insensitive to the changes in attitudes, educational attainment and expectations of the modern woman, but sees the "modern" woman as representing a small minority of her sex. The majority of women, part of the mass to which the media appeal, are interested in beauty contests, fashion and beauty tips and advice columns. Feels that audience reaction is the principal constraint to changing present-day attitudes regarding the assessment of news.

* Presents a brief description of the background and presentation of the radio programme. Examines the objectives and characteristics of the programme: the major focus is to work with young people to discover their talents and skills and channel them into very practical activities and also to create opportunities for themselves; this will promote the development of the country and demonstrate that among youth there is a great potential and power for change. Stresses the follow-up activities of interviews and counselling which bring the programme to the level of a very serious, dynamic and action-oriented body. The report concludes that this programme is an excellent example of the way the media can be used as a tool for development. The programme generates employment, forms links with agencies, and promotes personal fulfillment and development. Future proposals include the setting up of a small secretariat within WAND to cope with the follow-up aspect of the activity; and a special training programme for participants focussing on the world of work and human and personal development. Women in the Caribbean Project, Phase 1. General ----> CDC 5857

* Caribbean here refers to Barbados, Jamaica and Trinidad - choice determined by availability of historical data. Examines two primary sources of perceptions about women the church and the press. The study looks at images of the Caribbean woman and the extent to which they have developed into stereotypes which affect her negatively or positively. Investigations cover three periods: (1) emancipation period ending in 1900; (2) the period from 1901 to independence; and (3) the post independence period. Reports from each Wednesday's issue during 1838 of the longest running daily newspaper in each territory and all missionary reports are used as the central data base for the search for images. A range of other documentary sources is used to describe women's real behaviour. Merle Hodge's introduction examines a third source of perception - the Caribbean novel. The images of women in these novels reflect the tension between the official and the real culture. The conclusion suggests that the guide to behaviour for women advanced by image-makers in all three territories is that of a person whose purpose is derived from the existence of another. The identity of this other is different in the 3 loci. The research also suggests that Jamaican and Barbadian women are more subject to stereotype roles than are Trinidadians.

----> CDC 2718

- * An analysis of the mass media's coverage of women's issues and portrayal of women is used to support the argument that the mass media in the Caribbean have not kept pace with the changing self-definition of Caribbean women. The case against the media centres on five main issues: underutilization of media resources for communications for development, which includes the full and equal participation of women in the decision-making process of the media and recognition of changing social role and functions; under-representation of women's issues; sexist and negative portrayal of women; distortion of the issues regarding women's struggle for equality; and the persistence of sex role stereotyping. Women's participation in the media as workers is situated against the background of women's historic marginality in the wider socio-economic context. A survey of recruitment, access to training, mobility and remuneration of women in the media revealed that: women, even when delegated some authority, were still being overshadowed by a male executive; some women worked overtime without overtime pay and few women qualified for fringe benefits such as housing and other tax-free allowances; women in the public media felt that the structure and nature of government bureaucracy hampered their advancement.

* This article seeks to show that all women play critical roles in culture, and the writer shows this by comparing and contrasting the roles played by the Euro-creole woman, the black woman and the East Indian woman, in their respective societies. The article reveals that the Euro-creole woman was merely a defender of her inherited values, whereas the black woman played a most formidable role. However, the writer shows that after the 1940s, there were critical roles and cultural changes for all. Women continued to play a large role in culture, but that role is mainly now supportive.

* Examines why prevailing news values often accord women low priority and marginalizes them and their concerns. Refutes the notion that news is a completely detached reproduction of reality and argues that news is a product created in a particular socio-cultural-political context, channeled through news organizations and news people with certain news values produced by that context. Shows that news values which focus on important personalities and negativity, militate against coverage of news about women; stereotypes reduce complex socio-economic and political issues to a level of meaningless simplicity; event orientation emphasizes surface manifestations, not the forces at play beneath them; and the objectivity of the detached observer which journalism seeks, is in fact biased. Concludes that if reporters recognize that their perceptions are affected by their sex, socialization and culture, and then attempt to overcome such biases, they will have taken an important first step towards fair news coverage of women.

Feminist historiography seeks to make women the focus of enquiry, recognizing that women's history can never be studied in isolation and accepting the rich complexity of women's historical experience. The paper argues that histories in the Caribbean need to bring this kind of conceptual perspective to their work. - * Seeks to show the dialectical relationship existing between theoretical research and practical social action in the area of women's studies. The paper assumes that the women's movement is revolutionary in character and requires a revolutionary theory that is suited to its needs. The analysis draws on the experience of a woman's organization in Trinidad and Tobago, the Concerned Women for Progress, whose attempt to marry theory and "praxis" illustrates that: 1) praxis, especially in a society where the level of consciousness is low, has to be informed by theory; 2) theory has to be informed by praxis; and 3) praxis enhances the rigor of theory while being informed itself by theory.

- * Analyzes women's organizations which have been active in Trinidad and Tobago since 1970 focussing on one trade union women's group. The decade of the '70s saw the emergence of the National Joint Action Committee with its mainly, supportive women's section; the Housewives Asociation of Trinidad and Tobago which identified issues but failed to mobilize working class women; the government-initiated National Commission on the Status of Women which was isolated from other women's groups; and the Committee for the Defence of the Rights of Women which suffered from a fall-off in participation, 18 months after its inception. The experience of the Women's Auxiliary of the Transport and Industrial Workers' Union, typifies the limitations of women's caucuses within male-dominated organizations. Finally, the emergence of feminist organizations in the 1980s, is noted.

- * The article describes the character of the present society in which women live. It focuses on the manifold subordination of women of the lower classes, with their lives of violence and discrimination. However, women's organizations, such as the Antillean Women's Group, have made great strides in mobilizing women to take a stand on important issues. One of their outstanding achievements was to have three women elected to the Union Board of Directors. This has meant that women and the women's movement have become a strong social force, and more importantly, their issues are being regarded more seriously by policy makers.

Feminism, nationalism and the early women's movement in the English-speaking Caribbean (with special reference to Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago) / Rhoda E. Reddock. S.l.: s.n., 1988. 30 p.

* Paper makes the connection between Caribbean movements for women's emancipation and nationalist movements existing at the start of the twentieth century, and sees feminism in the Caribbean as emerging "out of the womb of other social movements." This study emphasizes the middle-class movements, and analyses the origins of a structured Caribbean feminist movement within the context of universal perceptions of the term, "feminism". The paper deals with the etymology of the word "feminism" as well as with the growth, significance and negative associations of feminism in the Caribbean, and seeks a more culturally autonomous definition for the woman's search for identity. The author distinguishes between those early movements and the prevailing working class struggles for justice and equity, and also between those early movements and the contemporary preoccupation with feminism as an ideology that embraces the factors of race and class. Caribbean feminists of the time, as with feminists throughout the world, hardly challenged the existing sexual division of labour. Moreover, because of the class orientation of the early Caribbean feminists the struggles of working class and peasant women were in many ways undermined; domestic workers were trained to conduct household chores the European way; and there was the adoption of the North American pattern of introducing domestic science and home economics as a significant facet of the women's agenda. Concludes that, notwithstanding the benefit of hindsight, the lesson of these early experiences is that the solutions for women's equality and identity are not to be found in the acquisition of a greater share of the rewards in an exploitative, racist and patriarchal system, but in the system's fundamental Provides historical data on some early transformation. women's organizations, among them, Lady Musgrave Self-Help Society of Jamaica, founded in 1901; and the Jamaica Women's Social Service Club (WSSC) as well as the Coterie of Social Workers (Trinidad and Tobago) founded by Audrey Jeffers, both of these established in 1918. Jamaica's Amy Bailey and Trinidad's Audrey Jeffers both voted against Universal Adult Suffrage in the 1940s.

* First traces the role of women in the economies of the selected countries to their present state emphasizing their resourcefulness and new mobility. A general historical background of these countries is given showing the dependency of these economies. A comparative discussion of the Bureaux is then presented under various themes including structure and staffing; methods of operation, links with other bodies and achievements. There are detailed case studies of six selected countries which are: Jamaica, Guyana, Barbados, Grenada, Dominica and Belize. Concludes that: there was generally an urgent need for machinery to link governments with these Bureaux in addressing issues affecting women; that achievements of the Bureaux were limited - the main achievement being to sensitize the public on women's concerns. The Bureaux therefore emerge as somewhat weak. However, in none of the case studies was there any danger of the collapse of the organization except in the particular case of Grenada. Suggestions are given for greater dynamism of these Bureaux.

She notes that men were not ready to accept women as intellectual and articulate partners; that women who were actively involved in these early organizations were trail blazers and were often castigated by their peers for shirking their family responsibilities. She concludes that CARIWA was very effective in terms of the recognition it received as the voice of women in the region.

- Opens with an emphasis on the economic recession facing Guyana and the resulting government philosophy of self-employment. Policy areas reviewed are health, breast feeding, nutrition, education and training, employment, craft and agricultural production, activities of non-governmental organizations and of specialized and other agencies. Activities include health education programmes, the construction of a number of hospitals and health facilities, and community health workers programmes; the production of a booklet giving the nutritive values of various local foods, plus comparative prices and requirements for a balanced diet. The aim is to develop programmes that reflect ideological orientation; and the social and economic aspirations of the nation. Notes that the participation of women in technical institutions (1980-81) was 28 percent as opposed to 22.8 percent in 1979; employment has increased to 30 percent in 1980 as opposed to 26.9 percent in 1977; women have increased their participation in agriculture; women dominate food processing at all levels; non-governmental organizations have been instrumental in mobilizing women for agricultural production, have established a garment factory, promoted food processing, craft production, and have organized training courses for women in traditional and non-traditional skills. A Rural Integrated Development Project and a Textile Designs Project have been funded by the Voluntary Fund. Support has been provided by Unesco and UNICEF. The Women's Affairs Bureau places emphasis on the development of strategies aimed at formulating a National Programme for the Integration of Women in Development and in developing the institutional framework for sensitizing women to the goals and objectives of the national programme and objectives of the Decade for Women. Calls for the following support: assistance to strengthen the managerial and financial capability of the Women's Bureau in order to further programme and project development and project management; technical assistance in marketing and product development; technical assistance to further economic development and to reduce unemployment among women; financial and technical assistance in the documentation of reports on conferences and important meetings sponsored by the Bureau; sensitizing of women towards agriculture through out-reach programmes; and recruitment of part-time personnel knowledgeable in research in order to build an adequate data base.

* Discussion focuses on constraints to bureaux effectiveness, on providing strategies to strengthen the impact of women's bureau and the implementation of the Nairobi Forward-Looking Strategies (FLS). Case studies revealing negative and positive forces are utilized and illustrated by tables. Negative factors include relatively low priority being accorded to women in key sectors; insufficient interest, knowledge, or commitment to women and development on the part of liaison personnel; inadequate follow-up to committee decisions; and a lack of mechanisms for effective co-ordination. Objectives include developing inter-sectoral links required for policy formulation and programme implementation; the making of recommendations; providing a forum for the examination of pertinent issues of FLS; and developing the basis for national and regional plans of action. Necessary actions include awareness building to sensitize top management; formation of national advisory committees as a support to the bureau the establishment of interministerial committees to provide linkages, technical support and formation on sectoral policies and programmes; the establishment of an operational framework for women's bureau; discussing mandates to examine the impact of structural adjustment policies on women; legitimizing of Ministerial portfolios; and training. OECS and CARICOM are to provide regional training. The FLS was studied and problems noted were, the delegation of responsibility without authority and the lack of resources to implement objectives and functions. Strategies for FLS cover the areas of employment and agriculture. The need to establish links between the agricultural ministry and the ministries of planning, marketing, industry, health, nutrition and trade and non-governmental and regional organizations is Recommendations are made concerning agriculture, health and welfare, handicraft and the arts. One of the ways in which WAND has tried to raise awareness is through the curricula of various regional training programmes. In order to continue its work, however, WAND will need both the financial and moral support of the Governments of the region. There was a general concern for the lack of human and financial resources available to the national machineries for women. It was also noted that until amendments were made to existing legislation, women would continue to be disadvantaged. • An overview is given of the work of organizations such as CARIWA, WAND etc. It is observed that in CARICOM a significant feature of the women's movement is the degree of active co-operation and collaboration between governmental agencies and autonomous non-governmental organizations, based on a recognition of the complementary roles of the agencies operating at both national and regional levels. Some recommendations are made for the better functioning of the non-governmental organizations, among which are: 1) the need for more formal structuring, 2) the need to generate information to support programme planning; 3) the need for more technical expertise. The work is viewed against the background of the objectives of the Programme of Action 1980.

- Focuses on impediments to recognition and advancement of women in trade union organizations. These are identified as structural, defined by the hierarchical nature of trade unions based on a direct chain of command; psychological, determined by the absence of opportunity for risk-taking and decision making in jobs performed by women trade unionists; and poweriessness, owing to an inability to control resources. The nature of these disadvantages is perceived as being entered within a dominant ideology which ascribes to women's labour, a secondary status, in male dominated labour organizations. Study reveals what is described as a generalized version of trade unions division of labour, recruitment and job bias shifting women away from positions leading to the key decision-making offices of president and general secretary. Notes that power in trade unions is centrally controlled, often in the hands of one man and suggests emphasis on power specific strategies by women for greater upward mobility in trade unions.

During 1980-81 WAND's achievements included co-ordination of several training workshops; the preparation of material for curriculum development; and the development of projects focussing on The Advisory Committee made several rural women. recommendations to WAND on the latter's allocation of time and resources, sources of funding and on mechanisms to ensure that programmes complement and support each other. With regard to WAND's programmes for 1981-82, the committee recommended that WAND should in future restrict some of its activities and exercise more selectivity in the programmes it supports, and emphasized the need for WAND to strengthen its communications strategies. The committee also recommended that greater use should be made of national and regional consultants. The meeting also discussed WAND's linkages with other institutions and WAND's role in relation to other networks focussing on Women in Development issues.

* This evaluation of WAND's activities for the year and identifies successes and constraints encountered in their major The positive results of recently completed "Training of Trainers" programmes in St. Vincent and Dominica were reflected in an obvious increase in women's skills, self-confidence and understanding of the development Weaknesses were found in linkages between government agencies and NGOs. WAND identified constraints related to the political nature of development work and the necessity of avoiding involvement in political partisanship. WAND reports successes in its "people of Tomorrow" programme and proposes its development as a model for addressing problems of youth and unemployment in the region. In all its programmes, WAND sees a need for greater emphasis on a gender-base or perspective. The report includes a presentation by Peggy Antrobus which notes the negative effects of structural adjustment policies in the region.

- * Identifies imbalances in representation by women at high levels in major national institutions: political, religious, legal, medical and academic, and makes comparisons, on the basis of historical and cultural factors, in relation to what is perceived as differing levels of participation by African and East Indian women. Suggests a "re-furbishing" of the image of women and a change in male attitudes towards women in positions of authority. Comments on possible negative effects of the principle of centering around women's interests, as in women's studies, for instance, which could result in isolation and a form of segregation, leaving the main citadels of power intact. In this context the author draws a parallel with priorities given to black studies and African Studies in addressing problems of race.

* Examines the nature and characteristics of women's organizations in the Caribbean and the extent and quality of women's participation. Shows that women view groups as key sources of emotional support; groups examined have not proved to be channels by which women can actively participate in all aspects of social life; middle and upper-middle income women tend to dominate key decision-making positions; and older women seem more disposed to membership. Several factors are identified as inhibiting women's membership in organizations. These include competing responsibilities of home and work, a bias against participation in sex-segregated organizations; lack of leadership rotation; and a lack of perception as to the activities and benefits of organizations. A psycho-analytic explanation of the lack of solidarity in and between women's organizations is advanced. Recommendations aimed at encouraging women's participation in organizations and identifying research needs, are included. The analysis is based on the findings of the Women in the Caribbean Project Survey of Women in Antigua, Barbados and St. Vincent and on information obtained from personal interviews.

Women's movements and organisations in the process of revolutionary transformation: the case of Grenada / Rhoda E. Reddock. S.l.: s.n., 1983. 50 p.: tbls.

----> CDC 5910

- * Analyzes the image of women in Grenada's society since the take over of the PRG in 1979. Posits that their visibility now is outstanding. From the outset, measures aimed at ameliorating the conditions of women and involving them in national life were introduced and this will continue. In spite of the creativity and innovativeness of the PRG, however, there has been a growing tendency to closely model the programme for women, on the traditional strategies used in older socialist countries which have failed to: 1) successfully challenge the sexual division of labour; 2) equalize responsibility for housework; and 3) transform the oppressive bourgeois family. In Grenada, large numbers of women are not constrained by the old family system and so are freer to participate in the activities of the revolution and social production. In order, therefore, to develop new strategies and forms of social organization, an analysis, based on the peculiar characteristics of the regional and working-class situation, as well as an understanding of the origins and continual bases for women's oppression and exploitation and its interrelationship to class and national oppression, has to be developed. In doing so the traditional prejudices against feminism will have to be got rid of, and the wealth of research and analysis carried on by the socialist-feminists taken into consideration.

- * Identifies, selects and clarifies the principal activities in the Caribbean and Latin America to enhance the status of women focusing specifically on changes and achievements in information and communications programmes and processes. Study is based on an examination of available statistical information and other sources of national data; bibliographic and documentary information; mass communications media and the impact of new information technologies. In the context of a review and systematization exercise, an analysis is made of the dominant subject areas covered in documentation systems and literary productions in the Caribbean and Latin America. Study identifies two broad areas of concern repeatedly reflected in Caribbean and Latin American studies: women in employment and women's identity; and recommends a further strengthening of inter-institutional co-ordination and collaboration by the creation of mechanisms for facilitating the exchange of experiences and information at national, regional and world levels.

- * This document attempts a re-examination of the issue of women's migration, stressing the need for more macro-oriented analysis on the subject, and it is this bias that informs the bibliography. In the introduction, the compilers comment on contributions made by women migrant workers in the capital accumulation process, as well as on some distinct social formations which emerge e.g. the liberating effects of migration on women. The compilers urge a greater commitment to feminist considerations in analyses of women in migration, with linkages made between the "logic of gender" and the "logic of capital". The selected bibliography, therefore, focuses broadly on issues of migration and social change as well as on labour force integration and economic development.
